

Forgotten Books

— www.forgottenbooks.com —

Copyright © 2016 FB &c Ltd.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, distributed, or transmitted in any form or by any means, including photocopying, recording, or other electronic or mechanical methods, without the prior written permission of the publisher, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical reviews and certain other noncommercial uses permitted by copyright law.

VIRGIL

Enlarged from a Gem

7m

MASTERPIECES OF LATIN LITERATURE

TERENCE: LUCRETIUS: CATULLUS: VIRGIL:
HORACE: TIBULLUS: PROPERTIUS: OVID:
PETRONIUS: MARTIAL: JUVENAL:
CICERO: CAESAR: LIVY: TACITUS:
PLINY THE YOUNGER:
APULEIUS

WITH BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES AND NOTES

EDITED BY

GORDON JENNINGS LAING, PH. D.

ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF LATIN IN
THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

8057
4/10/

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY

Boston: 4 Park Street; New York: 85 Fifth Avenue

Chicago: 378-388 Wabash Avenue

The Riverside Press, Cambridge

7m

MASTERPIECES OF LATIN LITERATURE

TERENCE: LUCRETIUS: CATULLUS: VIRGIL:
HORACE: TIBULLUS: PROPERTIUS: OVID:
PETRONIUS: MARTIAL: JUVENAL:
CICERO: CAESAR: LIVY: TACITUS:
PLINY THE YOUNGER:
APULEIUS

WITH BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES AND NOTES

EDITED BY

GORDON JENNINGS LAING, PH. D.

ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF LATIN IN
THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

8057
4/14/

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY

Boston: 4 Park Street; New York: 85 Fifth Avenue
Chicago: 378-388 Wabash Avenue

The Riverside Press, Cambridge

Copyright, 1903,
BY HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.

All rights reserved.

The Riverside Press, Cambridge, Mass., U.S.A.
Electrotyped and Printed by H. O. Houghton & Co.

CONTENTS

[The names of translators are given in italics.]

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION	vii
TERENCE.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	1
PHORMIO	4
LUCRETIUS.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	63
INVOCATION TO VENUS. H. A. J. Munro	66
THE SACRIFICE OF IPHIGENIA. Goldwin Smith	67
ATOMS AND VOID. H. A. J. Munro	69
THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO EPICURUS. W. H. Mallock	71
THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD. H. A. J. Munro	74
THE FEAR OF DEATH. R. Y. Tyrrell	76
THE HONEY OF THE MUSES. H. A. J. Munro	77
LOVE'S EXTRAVAGANCE. H. A. J. Munro	78
THE DEVELOPMENT OF MAN. H. A. J. Munro	81
CATULLUS.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	100
ON THE DEATH OF LESBLA'S SPARROW. Sir Theodore Martin	102
DEDICATION OF HIS PINNACE. George Lamb	103
TO LESBLA. Robinson Ellis	105
TO THE SAME. Sir Theodore Martin	105
TO HIMSELF, ON LESBLA'S INCONSTANCY. R. Y. Tyrrell	106
VARUS' MISTRESS. J. Hookham Frere	108
TO FABULLUS. Sir Theodore Martin	109
TO SIRMIO. Leigh Hunt	110
TO DIANA. R. C. Jebb	111
TO CORNIFICIUS. Robinson Ellis	112
ACME AND SEPTIMIUS. Sir Theodore Martin	112
TO LESBLA. W. E. Gladstone	114
THE EPITHALAMIUM OF JULIA AND MANLIUS. J. Hookham Frere	115
REMORSE. Sir Theodore Martin, R. Y. Tyrrell	124
LOVE AND HATE. W. S. Landor	125

AT HIS BROTHER'S GRAVE. Sir Theodore Martin . . . 126

• CICERO.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH 127

THE SPEECH FOR CLUENTIUS. W. Peterson 130

FRIENDSHIP. (From De Amicitia.) Andrew P. Peabody . . . 151

LETTERS. E. S. Shuckburgh.

To Cn. Pompeius Magnus, in Asia 158

To his Wife and Family, in Rome. G. E. Jeans 160

To Atticus in Italy, on his Journey to Rome 162

To Caesar, in Gaul 163

To his Brother Quintus, in Gaul 165

To C. Trebatius Testa, in Gaul 166

To Atticus, in Rome 167

Cicero and his Son to Terentia and Tullia, in Rome 169

To Atticus, in Rome 171

Servius Sulpicius to Cicero, at Astura 172

To Atticus, in Rome 176

Cicero, the Younger, to Tiro 176

To Gaius Trebonius, in Asia 180

CAESAR.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH 182

THE SIEGE OF ALESIA. T. Rice Holmes 184

• VIRGIL.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH 198

DAMON AND ALPHESIBOEUS. Sir Charles Bowen 201

RULES OF HUSBANDRY. James Rhoades 208

SIGNS OF BAD WEATHER. James Rhoades 210

AFTER CAESAR'S DEATH. James Rhoades 212

ITALY. James Rhoades 213

THE BATTLE OF THE BEES. James Rhoades 215

AENEAS' DESCENT INTO HADES. Sir Charles Bowen 216

• HORACE.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH 273

TO LYDIA. Sir Theodore Martin 276

WINTER. Sir Theodore Martin 277

TO LEUCONOË. John Conington 278

TO THE SHIP OF STATE. R. M. Field 278

INNOCENCE. Sir Theodore Martin 280

TO CHLOE. Lord Ravensworth 281

ON THE DEATH OF A FRIEND. Sir Theodore Martin 281

TO LYDIA. Sir Theodore Martin 283

SIMPLICITY. W. E. Gladstone 284

A WOMAN'S WORD. Lord Ravensworth 284

THE GOLDEN MEAN. Lord Lytton 285

CONTENTS

A RECONCILIATION. Norma Rose Waterbury	286
TO THE SPRING OF BANDUSIA. John Conington	287
TO MAECENAS. Sir Stephen de Vere	288
COUNTRY LIFE. John Dryden	291
A CHALLENGE. Lord Lytton	294
A BORE. John Conington	295
A LETTER OF INTRODUCTION. Sir Theodore Martin	299
TO HIS BOOK. Sir Theodore Martin	300
TIBULLUS.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	302
THE POET'S IDEAL. James Grainger	303
A RURAL FESTIVAL. James Grainger	308
PROPERTIUS.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	312
BEAUTY UNADORNED. Goldwin Smith	313
TO MAECENAS. Thomas Gray	314
A CHANGE OF VIEW. Thomas Gray	318
A ROMAN MATRON TO HER HUSBAND. Goldwin Smith	320
✧ OVID.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	325
DIDO TO AENEAS. Alexander Pope	327
PHAËTHON. Henry King	334
LIVY. George Baker.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	348
THE HISTORIAN'S PREFACE	350
THE RAPE OF THE SABINE WOMEN	353
HORATIUS	356
BEFORE THE WAR	359
HANNIBAL	360
THE MARCH ACROSS THE ALPS	362
THE BATTLE OF CANNAE	372
THE CARTHAGINIANS IN CAPUA	380
THE END OF THE WAR	381
THE DEATH OF HANNIBAL	385
✧ PETRONIUS.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	387
AT TRIMALCHIO'S DINNER. R. Y. Tyrrell	389
MARTIAL.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	393
A FRIEND. Goldwin Smith	394
THE DINER-OUT. Goldwin Smith	395
A LITERARY HOST. James Elphinston	395
A ROMAN DAY. Goldwin Smith	396
THE TRUE BUSINESS OF LIFE. Goldwin Smith	396

A JUGGLER. James Elphinston	397
DEATH OF A CHARIOTEER. Goldwin Smith	398
TACITUS. Arthur Murphy .
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	399
CUSTOMS OF THE GERMANS	401
THE MUTINY OF THE PANNONIAN LEGIONS	410
THE GREAT FIRE AT ROME	424
JUVENAL.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	432
ROME. William Gifford	433
PLINY THE YOUNGER. John B. Firth .
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	450
TO CORNELIUS TACITUS	451
TO SOSIUS SENECIO	452
TO SEPTICIUS CLARUS	453
TO CALPURNIA	454
TO TACITUS	455
TO SURA	460
TO GEMINUS	464
TO MAXIMUS	465
TO FUSCUS	466
TO TRAJAN	468
TRAJAN TO PLINY	471
APULEIUS.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH	472
CUPID AND PSYCHE. Walter Pater	473

NOTE. — The several translations by Goldwin Smith from Lucretius, Propertius, and Martial are taken from his Bay Leaves, by his permission and that of The Macmillan Company, publishers of the volume. The following extracts also are used by permission of The Macmillan Company: Cicero's "Letters," from the translation by E. S. Shuckburgh; "The Last Stand of Vercingetorix," from Caesar's Conquest of Gaul, by T. Rice Holmes; Ode 29, Book III., from Sir Stephen de Vere's Odes and Epodes of Horace; and "Cupid and Psyche," from Marius the Epicurean, by Walter Pater.

The extract from Andrew Preston Peabody's translation of Cicero's De Amicitia is printed by arrangement with Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., the publishers; and the version of Horace's Ode 14, Book I., by permission of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers of Echoes from the Sabine Farm, by Eugene and Roswell Martin Field.

Acknowledgment is due also to Miss Norma R. Waterbury for permission to use her prize translation of Horace's Ode 9, Book III.

INTRODUCTION

IN this brief introduction an attempt will be made to give an outline of the general tendencies of Latin literature. The subject merits some attention, inasmuch as the emphasis constantly laid upon the Greek origin of Roman literary forms has tended to obscure the fact that the strongest forces in Latin literature were not due to Greek or any other influence, but were its own, its peculiar birthright. They were qualities derived from certain inherent characteristics of the Roman people, which showed themselves in the very earliest monuments of their literature, and which persisted throughout its history in spite of much running after foreign models and, in more than one period, of an unfavorable social or political milieu. I mean a certain seriousness of purpose, which found its most splendid manifestation in the expression of patriotism, in the glorification of the duties of citizenship, and in the construction of an enduring system of law; and together with this, a shrewdness which enabled them to see quickly the different aspects of a question, to be swift to detect hypocrisy and fraud, — the quality, in short, which, tempering their gravity, saved it from being merely heaviness, and which made them natural satirists. It is the former characteristic that we find exemplified in those religious observances of which the surviving chants formed a constituent part, in the early collections of laws, and in the historical records which the priests kept; it was the latter that animated the Fescennine verses, and formed the dominating element in the old satira. In the literature that followed, in the great majority of the works that were produced from the middle of the third century before Christ, we can trace one or other of these distinctly Roman tendencies.

Of the first we have innumerable examples in the department of oratory. This lay close to the practice of law, and ability in speaking was essential to every one who aimed at a public career. So important a rôle did oratory play in Roman life that its requirements practically controlled the whole system of education from the end of the primary school course, and the question whether any particular subject should find a place in the curriculum of the ludus grammatici or of the schola rhetorici was determined by its advantages or disadvantages as a preliminary to an orator's equipment. It is true that Roman orators were trained in Greek rhetorical methods, made a careful study of the great Greek orators, and were familiar with all the details of the battle between the Atticists and the Asiatics; but this, far from being slavish imitation, was only part and parcel of their desire for efficiency, their earnestness in everything they undertook. Whatever complex of influences may have been brought to bear on Cicero's oratorical style, to whatsoever extent the form may be contributory to the final effect, it is as ever the spirit that moves, the spirit of the Roman filled with a sense of the high responsibility of office, of the greatness of the Roman people. "The Senate and the People of Rome," "the Senate and the People of Rome," — this is the refrain that recurs again and again in all the great orations, as it does in the pages of Livy, for Livy's history is patriotism writ long, from the stately preface through the accounts of foreign wars and internal dissensions; and the chapters that more than others stir the blood are those that tell of the heroes who fought and died for their country, well content even at the cost of their lives to have deserved well of it.

Virgil's works breathe the same spirit of patriotism, his Georgics glorifying Italy with her mighty rivers, her cities crowning the hilltops, her teeming soil; his Aeneid exalting the race, descendants of gods and of heroes, men of prayer, yet withal strenuous in action, ready to suffer all things to attain their goal, gathering new strength from disaster, believing in the greatness of their destiny, fighting, waiting, enduring. And in Horace's lyrics we find from time to time the same note struck, as for example in the patriotic series at the beginning of the third book. These are not, perhaps, the odes that we turn to most frequently, yet they all show a consistent elevation. Tibullus too, with his love of fatherland, may be mentioned, and Propertius, pedantic and self-concentrated, but patriotic still.

Even in a branch so directly influenced by Greek work as philosophy there is a strong infusion of Roman spirit. In this department the Romans made absolutely no original contributions, founded no new schools, yet there is a sufficiently imposing list of men who in one way or another performed signal service. They emphasized the practical side of philosophic doctrine, made plain the drift of the teaching of this or that school, and brought philosophy down from the clouds to dwell among men. In Lucretius' De Rerum Natura we have, so far as the subject matter goes, nothing more than an exposition of the theory of Epicurus, but in the intense seriousness with which the poet points out the practical bearing of the creed and its great importance for the conduct of life, the tone of the work is essentially Roman; and it is to this very Roman element that it owes its tremendous vigor of presentation, its glowing portrayal of the blessings of Epicureanism. Widely different from the method of Lucretius is that which Cicero adopted in his philosophical works, in which we find urbanity instead of vehemence, and a tolerant eclecticism instead of the dogmatic teaching of a single creed. Yet there are some points of similarity between the two in that Cicero also aimed at making Greek philosophy accessible to the Romans, and he too laid stress upon the value of literary form as an element of success. He did succeed, not only in his own day but in later centuries as well, when his writings were the principal medium through which Greek philosophy became known to western Europe.

Other writers, other fields, other periods might be drawn upon for further illustration of the serious practical trend of the Roman mind, as for example that great mass of legal lore which, accumulating year after year for centuries, found a final codification under Justinian, a κτῆμα ἐς αἰεί, the foundation of all modern law; or those writings in which agriculture had a long series of exponents, ranging from the dry didacticism of Cato to the poetic elevation of Virgil's Georgics. Nor can I refrain from mentioning that sacred band, among whose ranks even so great a personage as Julius Caesar has a place, the Roman grammarians, who, zealous and acute, albeit sometimes misguided, exorcised the spirits of many a problem of tense and mood, of long and short, — ghosts that have even to this day wandered restlessly over the world, refusing to be laid, although more than the traditional three handfuls of dust have been thrown upon their remains.

The satirical vein was steadily productive, appearing either deliberately, of set purpose and intent, in writings aimed at various abuses, or incidentally in works of heavier calibre. It is represented, as we have seen, in such remnants as we have of the early literature. It found exuberant vent in the comedies of Plautus, and in a modified form enlivened the plays of Terence. In Lucilius it attained to full and free expression, and his fearlessness and vigor of attack, his keenness of vision and rapidity of execution became proverbial. Unfortunately he is not known to us except in fragments of his works and through the references of other writers, but we have enough to see that he was singularly virile of mind and facile of pen. As trenchant as he was merciless, he showed in his attacks on vice in high places a range of conception that does not remind us of a literature in the making. His technique was rude, as Augustan critics noted, but its rudeness or crudeness served in many cases to point the asperity of his invective.

Nor is satire wanting in the best of the later republican literature. It gave a Lucilian edge to more than one poem of Catullus, made the dicta of Caesar famous, was the salt of Cicero's orations, in urbane guise one of the charms of his letters.

Emergent still under the Empire it manifested within Horace's own work a striking development.

Conventional at first and having more than a modicum of the old personal element, it presently adopted broader methods, and by its substitution of types for individuals, by its potentialities of suggestion, its creation of atmosphere, it gained in subtlety what it lost in directness, and succeeded by its very lightness, its elusiveness, its lack of insistence. In Persius we have a tortured imitation of the same form, with frequent echoes of Horace, but broken echoes only. The style is recondite and obscure. Much studied and over elaborated, it smells of the lamp. The poet's whole manner, with its many phrases of but doubtful meaning, its hazy situations and invisible transitions, shows that he wrote for an age which could be impressed only by the unusual.

Of a different ilk is the satire of Petronius, coming not out of the schools, but seeming to spring from the ground soil of Italy. Spontaneous and exuberant, it teems with broad characterizations and realistic pictures of low life. Elaborate descriptions of petty incidents are set off by the introduction of the quaint idiom of popular speech with its proverbs, its slang, its many expressions of mingled simplicity and shrewdness.

Later times furnish us with still further examples of this race tendency to satire. We see it highly developed in the writings of the historian Tacitus, who was in some respects most Roman of them all, — of more than Roman gravity, of more than Roman keenness of satire, a man of republican ideals living in an age which had seen tyranny. We find it in Juvenal, whose style, strongly influenced by the standards of the public readings, is one of boundless vehemence, showing many vivid word-pictures and brilliant sententiae. His rhetoric is sometimes pompous, on

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

have lines that sound with the clash of struggling battalions, there the perfect quiet of a lonely hillside; now the peace and plenty of vineyards and oliveyards, now battle-fields that show, like a picture by Verestchagin, the grisly realities of war. His is not the restraint of later art, but the storm of undisciplined power, seeing every detail in the white light of his own imagination, and painting it as he saw it. Virgil has less power, but his art is subtler, his workmanship finer, and although the themes of many of his pictures are drawn from Homer, the composition, the details, the atmosphere are of his own creating. His poems abound in golden words and phrases, in lines of an exaltation that could be found only in one who stood on the higher plane of poesy, who had been touched by the divine afflatus. He was the interpreter of the muses, the vates, the inspired seer.

There were ventures in divers other fields; and even if these constitute only a minor part of the message which Roman literature has brought to the world, they are none the less of abiding interest, not simply as so many indications of the different influences that bore on the evolution of literature and of society, but by reason of their intrinsic worth. In lyric poetry, for example, besides the patriotic odes of Horace we have by the same hand many other pieces, of lighter tone and not always showing the elevation of the true lyric, yet of enduring charm, winning us by their very restraint, by their perfect artistic form, their many successes of phrase and line, their good humor, their kindly philosophy; and Catullus, his predecessor, of more spontaneous utterance, more passionate, of greater intensity, of rare depth of feeling and sincerity of expression. In elegy, too, the Romans were conspicuously successful. This was a favorite medium of emotional expression, and shows a wide range of tone in the different works of Tibullus, Propertius, and Ovid. In pastoral poetry there are the Eclogues of Virgil, which, with all their inconsistencies of scenery and not infrequent political drift, rank with the best of his work. In epistolography the Letters of Cicero are an exemplar of the best Latin style with its toga off; while the correspondence of Pliny, an imitation of them, furnishes us with many glimpses of a personality that, even if not constructed on a large plan, is not without its interesting sides. Nor is fiction altogether wanting, as the Satirae of Petronius bear witness, and a hundred years later the Golden Ass of Apuleius, which gives us both by content and by style signs manifest that the old order of things was at an end.

Of strictly original dramatic composition there was but little. In consideration of their satirical tendencies it might have been expected that native Roman comedy would have flourished. The work done, moreover, by Plautus and Terence in the adaptation of Greek plays shows clearly that vis comica was not lacking. Yet at a comparatively early period we find legitimate comedy hardly able to hold its own against the mime and other doubtful forms of comic entertainment. Neither can the Romans be said to have succeeded in tragedy. It is true that the adaptations of Greek tragedies which the first wave of Hellenism brought with it seem to have had, to a very considerable extent, dignity of characterization and dramatic effectiveness. This is the judgment of Quintilian, and the fragments that remain confirm it. Yet the later examples, the plays of Seneca written in the age of Nero, show that even at that date tragedy had not escaped from its Greek leading-strings. Here again we have the same old themes of Greek mythology, and such changes of manner as we find in the introduction of lurid details and melodramatic situations, in the constant striving for epigrammatic and sententious effects, do not make for an increase in strength. The fundamental cause of this failure in the higher forms of dramatic expression is probably to be found in the Roman lack of creative power in art. This resulted in the production of plays which, adhering closely to Greek models, failed by the very remoteness of their subjects to hold audiences which were, for the most part, of a low grade of culture, and whose interest in gladiatorial and similar exhibitions, part of their heritage as a fighting people, was encouraged more and more by the ruling class.

In the selections that follow an attempt has been made to give a representation of Latin literature in English translations. That some authors, some works that might reasonably be looked for are not represented is due either to lack of space or to the fact that there are no good translations of them. Plautus, for example, does not appear, for the reason that, only a certain amount of space being available for comedy, it seems probable that one play printed in its entirety will give a better idea of the class to which it belongs than shorter selections from different authors. The Phormio of Terence has accordingly the double function of representing both its author and the type known as the Fabula Palliata. This plan of giving selections of considerable length and of as much integrity as possible has been followed throughout. In Lucretius, the last part of the fifth book is the pièce de résistance; in Virgil the sixth book of the Aeneid; in Cicero, for the orations the second division of the Pro Cluentio, for the philosophical works a portion of the De Amicitia; in Livy, a series of chapters dealing with the career of Hannibal from his operations in Spain to his death in Bithynia. Where an author worked in several departments, these are represented, so far as their representation has been found to be compatible with the general plan of giving long selections. In the case of Cicero's orations one of the political speeches would have been preferred, but the Pro Cluentio has been substituted on account of the merit of the translation. In a few instances, where the translator's rendering seems somewhat more literal than the purpose of the book requires, changes have been made, for which the editor is solely responsible. Where the original is in verse, metrical translations have been regularly used, the only exceptions being the Phormio, where the version of the Roman Society of London has been drawn upon, and parts of Lucretius, where Munro's translation has been given. Throughout the book the aim has been to give the best translation, irrespective of the name or fame of the translator, and the fact that the renderings of the famous classicists of the eighteenth century have been very sparingly used is due to their seeming to be inferior to the more modern work.

GORDON JENNINGS LAING.

August 1, 1903.

TERENCE

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

A NATIVE of Carthage, born about 190 B. C., Terence came at an early age to Rome, where from the lowly position of a slave in one of the patrician households he rose to distinction as one of the great representatives of Roman comedy. He belonged to the literary clique known as the Scipionic circle, of which the younger Scipio Africanus was the most conspicuous figure, and which included among others Laelius, whom Cicero afterwards made the principal interlocutor in his dialogue On Friendship, Polybius the historian, Panaetius the Stoic philosopher, Philus, and Metellus, — all of them men of broad culture and deeply imbued with a love of Greek literature.

His literary activity was confined to the production of palliatae, comedies the scenes of which were laid in Greece, and which obtained their name from the fact that the personages represented wore the Greek pallium. They were not original compositions, but were based on plays of Menander (342–292 B. C.), and other dramatists of the so-called New Attic Comedy, who, differing essentially in their aims from the playwrights of the Old Attic Comedy, avoided politics, and devoted themselves to the portrayal of social life. Their comedies were comedies of manners. In a majority of the plays the central interest is a love intrigue of more or less doubtful morality. The same types of character recur again and again: the tearful lover, the damsel in distress, the unscrupulous parasite,¹ the intriguing slave, the choleric old man, the guileful courtesan, the jealous wife, the shameless slave-trader, the thieving and insolent cook.

¹ The hanger-on, who in return for his support, assisted his patron in questionable transactions.

The Phormio is representative of the class. It bears the name of the parasite, through whose intrigues the action is carried on. Two brothers, Chremes and Demipho, had gone abroad, leaving their sons, Phaedria and Antipho respectively, in the care of Geta, a slave. He, however, instead of obeying the fathers' instructions, proceeded to abet the sons in their evil courses, and presently both of them were entangled in love affairs of distressing complexity. Phaedria fell desperately in love with a music girl, Pamphila, who was owned by Dorio, a slave-trader, and for whose release thirty minae¹ were requisite; while Antipho married an orphan, Phanium by name, quieting her guardian's objections by collusion with Phormio, who summoned him into court and charged him with being her next of kin, and so, by Athenian law, under obligation to marry her. It is at this point that the play opens. Phormio is confronted by two problems: to reconcile Antipho's father to the marriage, and to get the thirty minae for Phaedria. In the latter case he is successful through his own efforts; in the former, chance favors him. Demipho, on returning to Athens, is very angry at what his son has done, and declares that he will never recognize the marriage. After much wrangling, Phormio agrees to take her off his hands, and marry her himself, provided he be given thirty minae. The money is forthcoming, and Phormio promptly uses it to purchase the music girl for Phaedria. It then transpires that Phanium, instead of being poor and unknown, is the daughter of Chremes by a secret marriage, and there is no further objection to her as a wife for Antipho. Chremes, whose double life has been exposed, is not in a position to treat Phaedria harshly, and so all ends happily.

Besides the Phormio, five other plays of Terence have

¹ About $540.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

PHORMIO

CHARACTERS.

DAVUS, a slave.

GETA, a slave of Demipho.

ANTIPHO, a young man, son of Demipho.

PHAEDRIA, a young man, son of Chremes.

DEMIPHO, an old man.

PRORMIO, a parasite.

HEGIO,

CRATINUS, } advisers of Demipho.

CRITO,

DORIO, a slave-trader.

CHREMES, an old man, brother of Demipho.

SOPHRONA, a nurse.

NAUSISTRATA, a matron, wife of Chremes.

A Cantor.

SCENE : A street in Athens. In the background the houses of CHREMES, DEMIPHO, and DORIO. The scene remains the same throughout the play.

ACT I.

SCENE 1.

Enter DAVUS, carrying a bag of money.

Davus. My great friend and countryman, Geta, came to see me yesterday. I had owed him a trifling sum for a long time, the balance of a small account, and he asked me to get it for him. I have done so, and am bringing it with me. I hear that his master's son has married a wife, and it is for her, I suppose, that this money is being scraped together. How unfair it is that the poor should always have to be adding to the treasures of the rich! This girl will carry off at one swoop everything that he, poor fellow, has saved with such difficulty and self-denial, out of his allowance, nor will she give a thought to the trouble he had in procuring it. They'll beat him out of another contribution when she has a baby, and another when the baby has a birthday, and another when it is initiated. The mother will take it all: the child will simply be the pretext for the presents. But I think I see Geta.

SCENE 2.

Enter GETA, from DEMIPHO'S house.

Geta (speaking to some one within). If a red-headed fellow should ask for me —

Davus. Here he is, you need n't go on.

Geta. Oh, I was looking for you, Davus.

Davus (giving him the bag). There! Take it, it's good money. You'll find that it's just the amount of the debt.

Geta. Thank you. I'm very much obliged to you for not having forgotten me.

Davus. You well may be, especially when you consider how people act now-a-days. One has to take it as a great favor if anybody pays what he owes. But why do you look so sad?

Geta. Why, don't you know what terrible trouble we're in?

Davus. No. What is it?

Geta. I'll tell you, provided you can hold your tongue.

Davus. What a simpleton you are! After proving a man's reliability in money matters, are you afraid to trust him with words? What is there in it for me to deceive you?

Geta. Well, listen, then.

Davus. I'm all attention.

Geta. Do you know Chremes, my old master's elder brother?

Davus. Of course I do.

Geta. Well, do you know his son, Phaedria?

Davus. As well as I know you.

Geta. It happened that both the old gentlemen had to go abroad at the same time: Chremes to Lemnos, and my master to an old friend in Cilicia, who had written to him, holding out tempting prospects of all but mountains of gold.

Davus. What! to him who had so much!

Geta. Never mind, that's his way.

Davus. Oh, it's I who ought to have been a rich man.

Geta. Both these old gentlemen, when they went away, left me as a sort of guardian to their sons.

Davus. A hard office, Geta!

Geta. So I have found by experience. My protecting deity must have been angry with me when I was left in charge. At first I began to check them; but why make a long story of it? So long as I was faithful to the old gentlemen, my shoulders ached for it. I remembered the proverb about the folly of kicking against the pricks. I began to humor them and to do whatever they wanted.

Davus. You know how to suit your market.

Geta. My young master did not get into any mischief at first, but Phaedria straightway got hold of a little music girl, and fell head over heels in love with her. She belonged to a brutal slave-trader. Phaedria had n't a penny to give for her — his father had seen to that — so all he could do was to feast his eyes on her, dangle after her, and escort her to her music lesson and home again. The rest of us had plenty of time on our hands, and used to accompany him. Now there was a barber shop opposite the school where she took her lessons, and we generally waited there till she was ready to go home. One day a young fellow came in crying. Surprised, we asked him what was the matter. "Never before," said he, "has poverty seemed to me so cruel and hard. I've just seen a maiden in this neighborhood weeping for her dead mother, who was buried right opposite. The girl had no friend, acquaintance, or kinsman — nobody but one old woman, to help her bury her mother. I felt for her; she was such a stunning-looking girl!" Why make a long story? He moved us all to compassion. "Had n't we better go and see her?" said Antipho. "I think so," said some one else; "show us the way, please." We set out, reached the place, saw her. She was beautiful, and there was all the more certainty about it because she had nothing to set off her beauty: hair dishevelled — feet bare — untidy — weeping — shabbily dressed. Her beauty had to be brilliant indeed, not to be eclipsed by all that. Phaedria merely said, "She's not bad looking," but my young master —

Davus. I know. He fell in love with her.

Geta. Yes, but do you know how deeply? Listen to what happened. Next day he went straight to the old woman, and implored her to let him have the girl. She refused, and said that what he asked was not right; that the girl was a citizen of Athens, a good girl of a good family. If he wanted her for his wife, she would agree to his marrying her legally; if not, she would have nothing to do with him. My young master did n't know what to do; he wanted to marry her, but he feared his father.

Davus. Would n't his father, on his return, have forgiven him?

Geta. What! He forgive him for marrying a low-born, dowerless girl? Never.

Davus. What was the outcome of it?

Geta. The outcome of it? There's a parasite named Phormio, an impudent fellow, the gods confound him!

Davus. What did he do?

Geta. He gave Antipho this advice: "It's the law that orphan girls must marry their next of kin, and this same law commands their next of kin to marry them. Now, I'll declare you to be next of kin, and will bring an action against you. I'll pretend to be a friend of the girl's father. The matter will come before a jury; I'll invent the whole story about who her father and mother were, and how she is related to you; and well shall I serve my own interest by so doing. You'll make no defence to any of these charges, and I'll win the case. Your father will come home. I'll have a law-suit on my hands. But what difference will that make to me? The girl will be ours."

Davus. What consummate impudence!

Geta. He got the young fellow's consent, and it was done; we went into court — lost our case — he married her.

Davus. You don't say so!

Geta. Yes, I do.

Davus. Oh, Geta! what will become of you?

Geta. I'm sure I don't know; all I know is that I'll bear patiently whatever may befall.

Davus. I like that; that's the way a man should act.

Geta. My only hope is in myself.

Davus. That 's right.

Geta. However, I suppose that I must go to an intercessor, who will plead for me in this way: "Let him off just this once, I pray you; if he offends again, I'll not intercede for him." Lucky if he does not add, "As soon as my back is turned, kill him, for all I care."

Davus. How about the young fellow who was so attentive to the music girl? How is he getting on?

Geta. But so so, poorly.

Davus. Has n't much to give her, perhaps?

Geta. Nothing but unalloyed hope.

Davus. Has his father returned?

Geta. Not yet.

Davus. When do you expect your old master back?

Geta. I don't know for certain, but I heard just now that a letter had come from him, and had been taken to the custom-house officers;¹ I'll go and ask for it.

Davus. Can I be of any further service, Geta?

Geta. No, good-by. [Exit DAVUS. GETA calls to slave within.] Hi, boy! Is no one ever coming? [Enter a slave. GETA gives him the bag.] Here, give this to Dorcium.² [Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE 1.

Enter ANTIPHO and PHAEDRIA from CHREMES' house.

Antipho. To think, Phaedria, that it should have come to this; that I should be afraid of him who has my interest most at heart, my own father, whenever I think of his return! Had I not been thoughtless, I should have been looking forward to his arrival in the proper spirit.

¹ They collected the port duties, and had the right to open letters.

² Geta's wife.

Phaedria. What's the matter?

Antipho. Do you ask, you who are my accomplice in so bold a deed? Oh, that it had never come into Phormio's head to advise me as he did, and that he had not urged me (though I did n't need much urging) to that act which was the beginning of all my troubles! Suppose I had not won her; I should have suffered for the next few days, but I should n't have been racked by this daily anxiety —

Phaedria. Oh, doubtless!

Antipho. Expecting my father to come any day, and put an end to my married life.

Phaedria. Other people fret because they see too little of those they love; you complain because you see too much of her. You have a surfeit of love, Antipho. But, as a matter of fact, this life of yours is one to be desired and longed for. So help me, Heaven, I should be ready to lay down my life, if I might enjoy my love as long as you have yours. Just think how I am suffering from want, while you are revelling in plenty; to say nothing of the fact that you have, without any expense, won a well-born, well-bred wife; that you have, just as you wished, been married publicly, and without any scandal. You would be a happy man if there were not one thing wanting — the temperament to bear your good fortune contentedly. If you had to deal with the slave-trader that I have, you would understand. But nearly all men's dispositions are the same; we are always discontented with our lot.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Antipho (aside). What flight or theft is this that he 's scheming?

Geta. But where shall I find Antipho? Which way shall I start to seek him?

Phaedria (aside). He 's talking about you.

Antipho (aside). I expect to hear of some great disaster or other from this messenger.

Phaedria (aside). Oh, dear!

Geta. I 'll go home; that 's where he generally is.

Phaedria (aside). Let 's call the fellow back.

Antipho. Stop, there!

Geta (without looking back). Umph! You speak haughtily enough, whoever you are.

Antipho. Geta!

Geta (looking back). It 's the very man that I want to see.

Antipho. Pray, let me have the news that you bring, and tell it to me, if you can, in a word.

Geta. I will.

Antipho. Out with it.

Geta. At the harbor just now —

Antipho. Not my —?

Geta. You 've guessed it.

Antipho. I 'm undone.

Phaedria. Whew!

Antipho. What am I to do?

Phaedria. What is it you say?

Geta. I 've seen his father, your uncle.

Antipho. Poor wretch that I am! How shall I ward off this sudden disaster? If my fortunes have fallen so low that I must be parted from you, Phanium, I don't care to live.

Geta. Well, then, if that 's so, Antipho, you ought to be all the more on the alert; Fortune favors the brave.

Antipho. I'm beside myself.

Geta. But, Antipho, this is just the time when you should n't be beside yourself, for if your father sees that you're afraid he'll think that you're to blame.

Phaedria. That's true.

Antipho. I can't change my character.

Geta. How would you manage if you had something harder to do?

Antipho. Why, since I can't do this, I should be still less able to do that.

Geta. There's nothing in this, Phaedria; let's be off. Why are we wasting time here? I'm going.

Phaedria. And I too.

Antipho. Oh, pray! Suppose I pretend to be brave? (feigning an expression of boldness). Will this do?

Geta (not turning round). You're talking nonsense.

Antipho. Look at my face, both of you. Now, will this do?

Geta. No.

Antipho. Well, then, this?

Geta. Almost.

Antipho. This, then.

Geta. That will do. Now stick to that, and see that you answer him word for word, tit for tat, and don't let him, however angry he may be, get the better of you by his savage abuse.

Antipho. I understand.

Geta. You were forced into it against your will by the law, the sentence passed upon you, do you understand? But who's the old gentleman I see at the end of the street?

Antipho. 'Tis he himself. I can't stay.

Geta. Oh, what are you doing, where are you going, Antipho? Stop, stop!

Antipho. I know myself and my offence; I leave Phanium and my life in your hands. [Exit hastily.] Phaedria. What will happen now, Geta?

Geta. You'll get a lecture; and I, unless I'm very much mistaken, shall be tied up and flogged. But, Phaedria, we ourselves must now carry out the advice which we just gave to Antipho.

Phaedria. Away with your "musts," — give me your orders.

Geta. Do you remember what you used to say at the very beginning of this business, by way of shielding us from blame, — that the case against us was lawful and clear, sure to win, as good as it could be?

Phaedria. I remember.

Geta. Well, there's need of the selfsame defence now, or, if possible, of one better and more plausible.

Phaedria. I'll do my best.

Geta. Now do you attack first. I'll be here in reserve, ready to relieve you, if you fail.

Phaedria. Agreed. (They retire to back of stage.)

SCENE 3.

Enter DEMIPHO.

Demipho (to himself, not seeing PHAEDRIA and GETA). To think of it, to think of it! Antipho married without my consent! Had he no regard for my authority? No, I'll say nothing about my authority, but for my displeasure? No shame? Oh, what an outrage! Oh, that Geta, his prompter!

Geta (aside). My turn at last!

Demipho. What will they say to me? What excuse will they find?

Phaedria (aside). Oh, I'll find one; don't let that trouble you.

Demipho. Will it be, "I did it against my will, the law compelled me"? Well, I concede that.

Geta (aside). Good.

Demipho. But wittingly and without a word, to let your opponents win — did the law compel you to do that?

Phaedria (aside). That's a hard one.

Geta (aside). I'll fix it; leave it to me.

Demipho. I don't know what I'm to do, seeing that this has happened. It's such a surprise that I can hardly believe it even now. I'm so upset that I can't bring myself to think it over. It shows that every one, even at the height of prosperity, should consider ways and means of bearing adversity — danger, loss, exile. A man returning from a journey should always keep in mind the possibility of his son being in a scrape, his wife being dead, or his daughter ill; he should remember that these are the common incidents of life, and so prevent their surprising him. Whatever turns out well contrary to his expectation, should be reckoned as so much gain.

Geta (aside). Oh, Phaedria, it's hard to believe, but I'm away ahead of my master in philosophy, for I've considered all the disagreeable things which may befall me on his return: to grind corn in the mill, be flogged, wear chains, work as a field hand. None of these things will surprise me. Whatever turns out well contrary to my expectation, I shall reckon as so much gain. But why don't you go up to him and begin to coax him?

Demipho. Why, here's my nephew Phaedria.

Phaedria (going up to him). How do you do, uncle?

Demipho. How do you do? but where's Antipho?

Phaedria. Your safe return —

Demipho. Yes, I know what you would say, but answer my question.

Phaedria. He's well, he's here; have you found everything to your liking?

Demipho. I wish I had.

Phaedria. What is it that's wrong?

Demipho. Need you ask me, Phaedria? A nice marriage you've brought about here in my absence!

Phaedria. What, are you angry with him on that account?

Geta (aside). What an artist he is!

Demipho. How could I fail to be angry with him? Just let me set eyes on him. He'll soon learn that his once lenient father has become harshness itself.

Phaedria. But, uncle, he hasn't done anything for you to be angry at.

Demipho. Why, look you now! it's all of a piece! they're in it together! Know one and you know all.

Phaedria. It isn't so.

Demipho. When Number One has done something wrong, Number Two stands forth as his advocate; when Number Two is in trouble, Number One comes forward. It's a mutual protection society.

Geta (aside). He doesn't know it, but the old man has painted them in their true colors.

Demipho. If it were n't so, you would n't be siding with him, Phaedria.

Phaedria. If Antipho's fault, uncle, had been one that affected his fortune or good name, I should n't have said a word against his suffering the punishment which he deserved; but when some one, resorting to sharp practice and taking advantage of our youth, laid a trap for us, and won the case, is it our fault, or the fault of the jury, who often, as you know, cast the rich from envy, and find for the poor from compassion.

Geta (aside). If I didn't know the details of the trial, I should really believe that he was telling the truth.

Demipho. Can any juryman get at the right and wrong of a case, when the defendant acts as he did and says never a word?

Phaedria. Any other well-bred young fellow might have done the same: when he appeared in court he could n't deliver the speech he had prepared; his modesty was too much for him.

Geta (aside). Phaedria's fine! But why don't I accost the old fellow? (going up to him.) How do you do, master? I'm delighted to see you safe home again.

Demipho. O worthy guardian! true prop of the family! to whose care I commended my son when I went abroad!

Geta. I've heard you for some time maligning us, and me most unjustly of all. Why, what did you expect me to do in this trial? The law does n't allow a slave to plead, nor can he be called as a witness.

Demipho. I pass over all that; I admit the defence that he was young, unsophisticated, afraid to speak; I allow your plea of being a slave; but however nearly related the girl might be, he need n't have married her. You should have given her a dowry, as the law directs, and she should have hunted up another husband. On what reckoning did he choose to marry a pauper?

Geta. It was n't a reckoning, but cash that we wanted.

Demipho. He could have raised it somehow.

Geta. Where? It's easy to talk.

Demipho. Well, if he could n't get it in any other way, he might have borrowed it on interest.

Geta. A pretty idea that! As if any one would trust him while you're alive!

Demipho. No, no, it shall not, it cannot be. I'll not let her live with him one single day as his wife. This is not a case for leniency. I wish some one would point out that fellow to me, or show me the place where he lives.

Geta. You mean Phormio?

Demipho. The man who took up this woman's case.

Geta. I'll have him here presently.

Demipho. Where's Antipho now?

Geta. Out.

Demipho. Go, find him, Phaedria, and bring him here.

Phaedria. I'll go right away.

[Exit into Dorio's house.]

Geta (aside). Yes, to Pamphila.

Demipho. I'll go home, and greet my household gods; thence to the market place and ask some of my friends to stand by me in this matter, so that I may be ready for Phormio if he should come.

[Exit into his house.]

ACT III.

SCENE 1.

Enter PHORMIO and GETA.

Phormio. You say that he was so frightened at his father's return that he ran away.

Geta. Quite so.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Phormio. It's this way: the net is not spread for the hawk or the kite, that do us harm; it's laid for those that do us none at all. In the one case there's profit, in the other mere labor lost. Men who have something to lose are exposed to divers perils, but I have nothing, and everybody knows it. What's that you say? Have me convicted, and take me to jail? No, no! they don't care to support a big eater, and to my mind they're wise not to wish to requite an injury by the greatest of favors.

Geta. Antipho will never be able to reward you as you deserve.

Phormio. That's true, but then no one is ever as grateful to his patron as he ought to be. Just think! You go to his house seat-free, you've had your bath, been anointed, there's not a care on your mind, while he has all the worry and expense. You have a good time, he frets and fumes. You may laugh, drink first, take your place first. Then a puzzling dinner is set before you.

Geta. What do you mean by that?

Phormio. One where you are puzzled which dish you had better taste first. Reckoning up how pleasant, how delicious these things are, shouldn't you regard the man who furnishes them as a god incarnate?

Geta. Here's the old man! Mind what you're doing; it's the first onset that's always the fiercest. If you hold your own in that, all the rest will be mere play. [They retire to back of stage.]

SCENE 2.

Enter DEMIPHO and his three advisers.

Demipho. Did you ever hear of anybody being wronged in a more insulting way than I have been in this matter? Stand by me, I pray you.

Geta (aside). He's furious.

Phormio (aside). Just keep your eye on me; I'll stir him up presently. (Aloud.) Good heavens! Phanium not related to him? Is that what Demipho says? Does Demipho say that she's not related to him?

Geta. That's what he says.

Demipho. I believe that this is the very man I was speaking of. Follow me.

Phormio. And says he does n't know who her father was?

Geta. That's what he says.

Phormio. And denies all knowledge of Stilpo?

Geta. Just so.

Phormio. Because the poor girl was left in want, people don't know her father, and she herself is neglected. Just see what avarice does.

Geta. If you cast any slurs on my master, you'll hear from me to your sorrow.

Demipho. The insolence of the fellow! He has actually come here to accuse me!

Phormio. As for the young man, I've no quarrel with him for not knowing much about my friend, who was well on in years, and in poor circumstances. He earned his living by the work of his hands, and so he generally stayed in the country, where he held some land under my father. I've often heard him tell how this kinsman of his neglected him. But what a man he was! the best I've ever known.

Geta. Something of a contrast between him and you!

Phormio. Oh, go and be hanged! If I had n't thought so highly of him, I never should have got into all this trouble with your family for the daughter's sake, whom your master is now treating so shabbily.

Geta. You scoundrel, are you going to continue abusing my master behind his back?

Phormio. But he deserves it.

Geta. You say so, you jail-bird?

Demipho. Geta!

Geta. You thief! You swindler!

Demipho. Geta!

Phormio (aside). Answer him.

Geta. Who is it? Oh!

Demipho. Silence!

Geta. This fellow has never ceased to heap abuse on you behind your back, saying things which don't apply to you at all, but to himself.

Demipho. Hold your tongue. (To PHORMIO.) Young man, pray answer me, if you please. Just explain to me who that friend of yours was, and how he claimed kinship with me.

Phormio. Fishing, just as if you did n't know him!

Demipho. I know him?

Phormio. Yes.

Demipho. I tell you that I don't know him; recall him to my memory, since you say I do.

Phormio. What, not know your own cousin?

Demipho. You'll be the death of me. Tell me his name.

Phormio. His name? Certainly.

Demipho. Why don't you tell it to me?

Phormio (aside). By Heaven, it's all over with me! I've forgotten his name.

Demipho. Eh! What's that you're saying?

Phormio (aside). Geta, if you remember what we said just now, prompt me. (Aloud.) Well, I won't tell you his name; you come to pump me, as if you did n't know.

Demipho. I pump you?

Geta (aside to PHORMIO). Stilpo.

Phormio. But after all, what do I care? His name was Stilpo.

Demipho. Whom did you say?

Phormio. Stilpo, I say; you knew him.

Demipho. I never knew him, and I never had a kinsman of that name.

Phormio. So? Are you not ashamed? Now if he had left behind him a property worth ten talents —

Demipho. The gods confound you!

Phormio. You'd have been the very first to trace your ancestry from memory, going back to grandfather and great-grandfather.

Demipho. I take you at your word. In that case I should on my return home have told everybody how she was related to me. Now do you do likewise. Pray, how is she related to me?

Geta. Well done, our side! (Aside to PHORMIO.) Look out, you there!

Phormio. I've already explained the whole matter clearly to those to whom it was my duty to explain it, the gentlemen of the jury. If what I said was untrue, why did n't your son disprove it?

Demipho. My son, indeed! I can't speak of his folly in the terms it deserves.

Phormio. But now do you, who are so wise, go to the magistrates, and ask them for a new trial, since it seems that you are sole monarch here, and can get judgment given twice in the same case.

Demipho. Though I've been wronged, yet rather than be involved in a lawsuit, or listen to your talk, I'll give her the dowry which the law orders, just as if she really were related to me. Away with her, and take five minae.

Phormio. Ha, ha! you're delightful!

Demipho. What's the matter? Isn't my request reasonable? Am I to be refused even this, the common right of citizens?

Phormio. And pray does the law order you to pay her off and get rid of her, after you've done what you liked with her, just as if she were a courtesan? Does it not, on the contrary, order that she be given in marriage to her next of kin, to live with him all her days, lest poverty should drive her to evil courses? And this is what you forbid.

Demipho. Yes, to her next of kin; but how do we come in? or why?

Phormio. Oh, my good sir, "don't plead a lost cause," as the saying is.

Demipho. What! not plead my cause? I'll not stop till I've gained my point.

Phormio. Nonsense!

Demipho. You'll see.

Phormio. Besides, we have nothing to do with you, Demipho; judgment has been given against your son, not against you; your time for marrying has passed.

Demipho. You're to think that he says everything that I say; or I'll turn him out of doors, wife and all.

Geta (aside). He's furious.

Phormio. Better turn yourself out.

Demipho. You scoundrel! Do you mean to thwart me in everything?

Phormio (aside). He's trying to hide it, but he's afraid of us all the same.

Geta (aside). You've made a good beginning.

Phormio (aloud). Now, why not bear what must be borne? Behave as you should, and let's be friends.

Demipho. I want your friendship, or wish to see or hear you!

Phormio. If you're on good terms with her, you'll have some one to comfort you in your old age; remember that you're getting on in years.

Demipho. Let her comfort you; take her for yourself.

Phormio. Don't let your anger run away with you.

Demipho. Now look here! Unless you're quick about taking that woman away, I'll throw her out of the house; that's all I have to say, Phormio.

Phormio. If you treat her in any way unbecoming a lady I'll bring a heavy action against you; that's all I have to say, Demipho. (Aside.) If I'm wanted, send to my house for me.

Geta (aside). I understand. [Exit PHORMIO.

SCENE 3.

Demipho. What trouble and anxiety my son has caused me by entangling us in this marriage! And he won't let me see him, so that I might at least know what he has to say about the matter, or what his opinion is. (To GETA.) Go, find out whether he has come home yet.

Geta. Yes. [Exit into DEMIPHO'S house.]

Demipho. You see how the matter stands. What am I to do? Speak, Hegio.

Hegio. What, I? With your permission, I think that Cratinus had better speak.

Demipho. Speak, Cratinus.

Cratinus. What, do you want me to speak?

Demipho. Yes, you.

Cratinus. I should like to see you do what is to your advantage. This is how I look at it: it's right and just that what your son has done in your absence should be undone; and you'll be able to manage it. That's what I say.

Demipho. Now do you speak, Hegio.

Hegio. I think that Cratinus has spoken to the best of his ability; but the fact is, "Many men, many minds!" Every one has his own way. It seems to me that what has been done by the law can't be undone, and that it's wrong to try.

Demipho. Now, Crito.

Crito. I reserve my decision; the matter is an important one.

Hegio. Can we be of any further service?

Demipho. You have done well. (Exeunt advisers.) I'm much more uncertain now than I was before.

Geta (entering from DEMIPHO'S house). They say that he has n't come back.

Demipho. I must wait till my brother comes; I'll do whatever he advises me. I'll go down to the harbor and inquire when he is to return. [Exit.]

Geta. But I'll look for Antipho, and let him know what's been done here. Ah, there I see him coming back in the very nick of time!

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Antipho. Well done, Phormio!

Geta. And I, too, did what I could.

Antipho. My Geta, I love you all.

Geta. The affair has begun as I've told you. So far everything's quiet, and your father's going to wait for your uncle's arrival.

Antipho. Why is he waiting for him?

Geta. He said that he wished to follow his advice in the matter.

Antipho. O Geta, how greatly I fear my uncle's return, for he, as it seems, is to decide whether I am to live or die.

Geta. Here's Phaedria.

Antipho. Where?

Geta. There, coming out of his training-school.¹

SCENE 5.

Enter DORIO and PHAEDRIA from DORIO'S house.

Phaedria. Dorio, listen to me, I beseech you.

Dorio. No, I won't.

Phaedria. Just a moment.

Dorio. Let me alone.

Phaedria. Do listen to what I have to say.

Dorio. But I'm tired of listening to the same thing a thousand times over.

Phaedria. But this time I'll tell you something that you'll be pleased to listen to.

Dorio. Go on, I'm listening.

Phaedria. Can't I prevail on you to wait for the next three days? Where are you going now?

Dorio. I was wondering whether you'd tell me anything new.

¹ Humorously applied to Dorio's house.

Antipho (aside). Ah! I'm afraid the slave-trader may —

Geta (aside). Get his head broken. I'm afraid of that too.

Phaedria. Won't you trust me?

Dorio. Nonsense!

Phaedria. If I give you my word of honor?

Dorio. Stuff!

Phaedria. You'll say that you were well repaid for your kindness.

Dorio. Words!

Phaedria. Believe me, you'll be glad that you did it; indeed that's true.

Dorio. Dreams!

Phaedria. Try me; it's not for long.

Dorio. The same old song!

Phaedria. I'll regard you as my kinsman, my parent, my friend, my —

Dorio. Chatter away.

Phaedria. To think of your being so hard and inexorable that neither pity nor entreaties have any effect on you!

Dorio. To think, Phaedria, of your being so thoughtless and shameless as to expect to bamboozle me with fine words, and get my girl for nothing!

Antipho (aside). I'm so sorry for him!

Phaedria. Alas! What he says is too true.

Geta (aside). How like himself each is!

Phaedria. I wish that this piece of bad luck had not happened to me at a time when Antipho has troubles of his own!

Antipho. Eh? What's that you're saying, Phaedria?

Phaedria. Oh, you lucky fellow!

Antipho. I lucky?

Phaedria. You've got your sweetheart, and you've never had to face a trouble like this.

Antipho. Got her! no, I'm like the man in the proverb, I "hold a wolf by the ears."¹ Dorio. That's just my difficulty with this fellow.

Antipho. Oh, don't be a slave-trader by halves!
(To PHAEDRIA.) Has he done anything final?

Phaedria. He? Yes, acted like a perfect brute, sold my Pamphila.

Geta. What! Sold her?

Antipho. What's that you say? Sold her?

Phaedria. That's what he's done.

Dorio. What a crime, for a man to sell a girl that he bought with his own money!

Phaedria. I can't get him to wait for me and put off his other purchaser for just the next three days, while I get together the money that I've been promised by my friends. If I don't give it you then, don't wait an hour longer.

Dorio. Still dinning that into my ears!

Antipho. It's not a long time that he asks for. Agree to his proposition. He'll repay twice over the benefit you confer.

Dorio. That's all talk.

Antipho. Will you let Pamphila be banished from the city? Have you the heart to sunder their love?

Dorio. Neither you nor I need trouble about that.

Geta. May all the gods give you what you deserve!

Dorio. I've borne with you against my will for several months; you've been all promises and tears, but no cash; now, instead, I've found a man with cash and no tears. Make way for your betters.

¹ Difficult to hold, dangerous to let go.

Antipho. But, if I remember rightly, a day was fixed long ago, by which you were to pay him.

Phaedria. So it was.

Dorio. Do I deny it?

Antipho. Has that day passed?

Dorio. No, but this one has come before it.

Antipho. Are n't you ashamed of your treachery?

Dorio. Not a bit, if I make anything out of it.

Geta. Dirt!

Phaedria. Dorio, is this the way to act?

Dorio. It's my way; take it or leave it.

Antipho. And you deceive him like this?

Dorio. But, Antipho, it's he who's deceiving me. He knew what I was; I thought he was something different. He's taken me in; I've been to him just what I always was. But however that may be, I'll do this much for you. The soldier said that he'd give me the money early to-morrow morning. If you bring it to me before he does, Phaedria, I'll act on my old rule, "First come, first served." That's all.

[Exit.]

SCENE 6.

Phaedria. What am I to do? Miserable man that I am, how can I find the money for him on such short notice, I who have less than nothing? If we could have got him to wait, it was promised me in three days.

Antipho. Geta, can we let him be so unhappy, him who helped me so kindly a little while ago, as you told me? Now that he needs it, let's try to repay our debt of gratitude to him.

Geta. That's what we ought to do, I know.

Antipho. Then be up and doing; you alone can save him.

Geta. What am I to do?

Antipho. Find the money.

Geta. I wish I could; but tell me where I'm to get it.

Antipho. My father's here.

Geta. I know he is; but what of that?

Antipho. A word to the wise!

Geta. Oh, that's what you mean?

Antipho. Yes.

Geta. A fine plan indeed! Not much! Have n't I every reason to congratulate myself, if I don't get into trouble on account of your marriage, without your bidding me for Phaedria's sake to run the risk of utter destruction by further mischief?

Antipho. He's right.

Phaedria. Oh, Geta, am I a stranger to you?

Geta. No; but is n't it enough that the old gentleman should be angry with us, without our goading him into such fury that there won't be any place left for entreaty?

Phaedria. What! Let another take her out of my sight to foreign parts? Never! So, while you can and while I remain here, speak to me, Antipho, look upon me.

Antipho. Why? Pray, what are you going to do?

Phaedria. I've made up my mind to follow her wherever she's taken, or to die.

Geta. The gods help you, but go slow.

Antipho. See whether you can give him any assistance.

Geta. How can I?

Antipho. Oh, find some plan for him, I implore you, Geta, or he'll do something rash that we'll be sorry for afterwards.

Geta. I'm trying to find one.

Antipho (aside). I believe Phaedria's saved.

Geta. But I'm afraid of getting into trouble.

Antipho. Don't be afraid; we'll share both good and bad fortune with you.

Geta. How much money do you want? Tell me.

Phaedria. Only thirty minae.

Geta. Thirty? Why, she's very dear, Phaedria.

Phaedria. No, a girl like that is cheap at the price.

Geta. Well, well, I'll find the money and hand it over to you.

Phaedria. Oh, you dear old fellow!

Geta. Be off with you.

Phaedria. I want it without delay.

Geta. You shall have it without delay. But I must have Phormio to help me in this business.

Antipho. He's ready; lay any burden you please on his shoulders, he'll bear it; there never was such a friend as he.

Geta. Then let's go to him straightway.

Antipho. Can I be of any use to you?

Geta. No. Go home and cheer up that poor girl, who, I'm sure, is sitting in there half dead with fear. Why don't you go?

Antipho. There's nothing I should like to do so much. [Exit into DEMIPHO'S house.]

Phaedria (to GETA). How will you manage it?

Geta. I'll tell you as we go, only come away from here. [Exeunt PHAEDRIA and GETA.]

ACT IV.

SCENE 1.

Enter DEMIPHO and CHREMES.

Demipho. Well, have you brought back your daughter with you, on whose account you went to Lemnos?

Chremes. No.

Demipho. And why not?

Chremes. When her mother saw that I was staying here rather a long time, and the girl's age did n't admit of neglect on my part, she set out, so they said, with all her household, to come to me.

Demipho. Pray, then, why did you stay there so long after you had heard this?

Chremes. Hang it!¹ I was ill; that delayed me.

Demipho. What caused your illness? The circumstances?

Chremes. Do you ask me? Why, old age itself is an illness. However, I've heard, from the sailor who brought them over, that they got here safely.

Demipho. Have you heard, Chremes, what has happened to my son while I was away?

Chremes. Yes; and his action makes me uncertain what to do; for if I offer my daughter in marriage to an outsider, I'll have to explain in detail how and by whom she is mine. Now I know that I can trust you as myself; whereas, if an outsider wishes to form a connection with me, he'll say nothing so long as we're on good terms, but if we fall out, he'll know more than there's any need of his

¹ Chremes is restive under his brother's cross-questioning, and makes somewhat evasive answers.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Geta (aside). I'll approach them. (Aloud.)
Our own Chremes! How do you do?

Chremes. How do you do, Geta?

Geta. It's a great pleasure to see you safe home again.

Chremes. Yes, yes.

Geta. How goes it?

Chremes. I've found a good many changes here — the usual experience of one coming home.

Geta. True, indeed. Have you heard what Antipho has done?

Chremes. Yes, the whole story.

Geta (to DEMIPHO). Did you tell him? What a shame it was, Chremes, that he should be overreached in that way!

Demipho. That's what I was just telling Chremes.

Geta. Well, I've turned the matter over carefully in my mind, and I think I've found a remedy.

Chremes. What is it, Geta?

Demipho. What's your remedy?

Geta. After leaving you, I happened to meet Phormio.

Chremes. Who's Phormio?

Geta. The man by whom that girl —

Chremes. I understand.

Geta. I thought I might as well sound him, so I took him aside. "Come, Phormio," I said, "why should n't we settle this business in a friendly way, instead of quarrelling over it? My master's a gentleman, and does n't care to go to law, though, by Heaven, all his friends just now agreed in advising him to turn her out of doors."

Antipho (aside). What's he up to? Where will all this end?

Geta. I went on, “Do you say that he would have to pay the legal penalty, if he cast her forth? That matter has been looked into already. Oh, but you’ll sweat if you go to law with that man. Such a speaker as he is! And even suppose you win, after all, it’s only his money, not his life that’s at stake.” When I saw that I had made some impression on him by this sort of talk, I added, “We’re all by ourselves here now; tell me what you’ll take, cash down, the understanding being that my master desists from the lawsuit, the girl takes herself off, and you trouble us no more.”

Antipho (aside). Has Heaven deprived him of his wits?

Geta. “For I’m quite sure that if you say anything like what’s fair and right, he’s such a good fellow that you’ll not have to exchange three words this day.”

Demipho. Who ordered you to say this?

Chremes. But, Demipho, we can’t get what we want on better terms.

Antipho (aside). It’s all over with me!

Demipho. Go on with your story.

Geta. At first he talked like a madman.

Chremes. Pray what did he ask?

Geta. Far too much.

Chremes. But how much? tell me.

Geta. If we would give him a great talent¹—

Demipho. A great drubbing, he means! The impudence of him!

Geta. Just what I said to him. “Pray what more could my master do, even if he were arranging the marriage of an only daughter? He’s not gained much by not having had one, seeing that a girl's been found for him to provide with a dowry." His last words were, "From the very beginning I've been willing, as in duty bound, to marry my friend's daughter, for I thought how much she would suffer if, poor as she was, she were handed over to some rich man as his slave. But to speak plainly with you, I wanted some one who would bring me a trifle of money to pay my debts. Even now, if Demipho is willing to pay me as much as I shall get with the girl I'm engaged to, there's no one I should sooner have for my wife than Phanium."

¹ About $1180.

Antipho (aside). Is this stupidity or malice? Has he something in view, or does n't he know what he's doing? It's more than I can tell.

Demipho. But suppose he's head over heels in debt?

Geta. "My land," he said, "is mortgaged for ten minae."¹

Demipho. All right, he shall marry her. I'll give the money.

Geta. "And my house for ten more."

Demipho. Oh, no! that's too much.

Chremes (to Demipho). Be quiet. (To Geta.) Draw on me for those ten.

Geta. "I must buy a maid for my wife; I need a little more furniture; then there are the expenses of the wedding. Call that another ten."

Demipho. Let him straightway bring a thousand actions against me! I won't give him anything! Shall this infamous scoundrel insult as well as cheat me?

Chremes. Do be quiet. I'll pay it; all you have to do is to see that your son marries the girl we want him to marry.

¹ About $197.

Antipho (aside). Woe's me! Geta, you've undone me with your tricks.

Chremes. It's for my sake that she's being turned out; it's only right that I should lose the money.

Geta. "Let me know as soon as possible," he said, "whether they will give her to me, so that I may break off my engagement, and not be left in suspense. The other parties, you understand, have promised me a dowry."

Chremes. Let him have the money directly; he shall break off his engagement, and marry Phanium.

Demipho. And much good may it do him!

Chremes. By good luck I have some money with me now, the rent of my wife's estate in Lemnos; I'll take it, and tell my wife that you wanted it.

[Exeunt CHREMES and DEMIPHO into the former's house.]

SCENE 4.

Antipho (coming forward). Geta!

Geta. Well!

Antipho. What have you done?

Geta. Cleaned the old gentlemen out of their money.

Antipho. And is that enough?

Geta. I don't know. 'T was all I was told to do.

Antipho. What, you scoundrel, won't you answer my question?

Geta. Why, what are you talking about?

Antipho. Talking about? Thanks to you, I may as well go and hang myself. May all the gods and goddesses in heaven above and hell beneath make an example of you! Look you, if you want anything done, put it in this man's hands, and he'll bring you out of smooth water unto a rock. What worse policy could there have been than to touch this sore, and mention my wife? You've given my father hopes of being able to turn her out. Come now, if Phormio gets this dowry, he'll have to marry her. What's to be done then?

Geta. But he won't marry her.

Antipho. Oh, no! of course not! And when they demand their money back, on my account, forsooth, he'll prefer the stocks!

Geta. There's no story, Antipho, that can't be spoiled in the telling. You leave out all the strong points, and put in all the weak ones. Now hear the other side. If he receives the money, he'll have to marry her, as you say, and I agree with you so far. But at least some little time will be given for getting ready the nuptials, for invitations, for sacrificing. Meanwhile, Phaedria's friends will give him the money that they have promised, and then Phormio will pay it back again.

Antipho. On what ground? What excuse will he make?

Geta. Do you ask? Why, he'll say, "So many evil omens have befallen me since this business was begun: a strange black dog came into my house; a snake fell from the tiles through the skylight; a hen crowed; the soothsayer has forbidden it; the diviner has put a stop to it; to begin any new business before winter" — an excellent reason. That's how things will go.

Antipho. I sincerely hope so.

Geta. They will; trust me. Here's your father coming out of the house. Be off, and tell Phaedria that we've got the money. [Exit ANTIPHO.]

SCENE 5.

Enter DEMIPHO and CHREMES from the latter's house.

Demipho. Never you mind, I say ; I'll take care that he does n't cheat us. I'll never be fool enough to let this money out of my hands without having witnesses present ; I'll tell them to whom I give it, and for what.

Geta (aside). How careful he is when care is n't needed !

Chremes. That's how you ought to do it ; and make haste, while he's of the same mind, for if that other girl becomes more urgent, he may throw us over.

Geta. You've hit it exactly.

Demipho (to GETA). Then take me to him.

Geta. I'm all ready.

Chremes. When you've done this, come over and see my wife, and she'll call on the girl before she goes away. She'll tell her, by way of preventing her being angry, that we're going to marry her to Phormio ; that he's much better suited to her, inso-much as he's more closely connected with her ; that we've not failed in our duty, and have given him as much dowry as he wanted.

Demipho. What the deuce have you to do with that ?

Chremes. A great deal, Demipho. It's not sufficient to do your duty ; you must win the world's approval as well. I want her to act of her own free will, so that she won't say that she was turned out.

Demipho. I can do all this myself.

Chremes. Yes, but it takes a woman to manage a woman.

Demipho. Well, I'll ask your wife to do it.

[Exeunt DEMIPHO and GETA, R.

Chremes. Now I wonder where I'm to find those women.

SCENE 6.

Enter SOPHRONA from DEMIPHO'S house.

Sophrona. What am I to do? Wretched woman that I am, whom can I find to befriend me? Whom can I ask for advice? Where turn for help? I'm afraid that, as a result of my counsel, my mistress may be shamefully treated, for I hear that the young man's father is furious at what he's done.

Chremes (aside). Now, who in the world is this old woman coming out of my brother's house in such a fluster?

Sophrona. It was want that drove me to it. I knew that this marriage was invalid, but I wanted her to be safe in the meantime.

Chremes (aside). By Heaven, unless my mind deceives me or my eyesight's failing, this is my daughter's nurse.

Sophrona. And the man who is her father —

Chremes (aside). What am I to do?

Sophrona. Can't as yet be discovered.

Chremes (aside). Shall I go up to her, or wait till I understand better what she's saying?

Sophrona. But if I could find him now I should have nothing to fear.

Chremes (aside). It's she herself; I'll speak to her.

Sophrona. Who's talking here?

Chremes. Sophrona!

Sophrona. And mentioning my name?

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Chremes. Then what about the other who was said to be his kinswoman?

Sophrona. Why, this is she, of course.

Chremes. What's that?

Sophrona. We made up that story, so that her lover might get her without a dowry.

Chremes. Gracious Heavens! How often things one dares not hope for are brought about by mere chance! On my return home I've found my daughter married to the man I wanted and in the way I wanted. With great trouble to himself, but without troubling us in the least, he, all alone, has done what my brother and I were trying so hard to do.

Sophrona. Now see what's to be done. The young man's father has come home, and they say that he's very angry.

Chremes. Never fear; but in the name of gods and men don't let anybody know that she's my daughter.

Sophrona. Nobody shall know through me.

Chremes. Come with me; I'll tell you the rest inside. [Exeunt CHREMES and SOPHRONA into DEMIPHO'S house.]

ACT V.

SCENE 1.

Enter DEMIPHO and GETA, R.

Demipho. It's our own fault that we make it men's interest to be rogues. We're too eager to be called good and kind. "Run, but not past your own house," as the saying is.¹ Wasn't it enough for me to have been wronged by the fellow, without actually throwing away money, and giving him means of subsistence until he can bring off some new villainy?

¹ Run away, if it is necessary, but not so precipitately as to pass your natural shelter; don't let your panic drive you to extremes.

Geta. Assuredly.

Chremes. The people who get rewarded nowadays are those who put wrong for right.

Geta. Very true.

Demipho. So we've managed matters very badly in dealing with him.

Geta. It'll be all right, provided you can end the affair as you planned, by getting him to marry her.

Demipho. What! Is there any doubt about that?

Geta. Indeed, I'm rather inclined to fear (knowing the man's character) that he may change his mind.

Demipho. What! Change his mind?

Geta. I don't know, I only say "he might."

Demipho. I'll do as my brother advised: I'll bring his wife here to talk to her. Geta, go on ahead, and tell Phanium that Nausistrata is coming.

[Exit DEMIPHO into CHREMES' house.]

Geta. We've found the money for Phaedria; there hasn't been a word said about the lawsuit; we've arranged that the girl shan't leave just yet. What next? What's to be done now? You're still in the same fix, Geta; it's a case of paying one with what you've borrowed from another. The punishment that was close at hand has been staved off for a while, but your score of stripes will mount up unless you look out. Now I'll go home and explain matters to Phanium, so that she won't be afraid of Phormio or of what Nausistrata may say.

[Exit into DEMIPHO'S house.]

SCENE 2.

Enter DEMIPHO and NAUSISTRATA from CHREMES' house.

Demipho. Now, Nausistrata, with your wonted tact, get her into a good humor with us, so that she 'll do willingly what she has to do.

Nausistrata. I will.

Demipho. You 're helping me by your services now, just as you assisted me with your money a little while ago.

Nausistrata. You 're quite welcome, but indeed I 'm less able to help you, through my husband's fault, than I ought to be.

Demipho. Why?

Nausistrata. Because he 's careless of my father's honest earnings. My father used to get two talents a year regularly out of those estates. What a difference there is between one man and another!

Demipho. Two talents, you say?

Nausistrata. Yes, two talents, and that, too, when things were much cheaper than they are now.

Demipho. Heavens!

Nausistrata. What do you think of that?

Demipho. Oh, I quite agree with you.

Nausistrata. I wish I 'd been born a man, I should have shown them —

Demipho. I 'm sure you would.

Nausistrata. How to —

Demipho. Pray, spare yourself for your interview with the girl, lest, being so young, she tire you out.

Nausistrata. I 'll do as you wish; but I see my husband coming out of your house.

SCENE 3.

Enter CHREMES from DEMIPHO'S house.

Chremes (not seeing his wife). 'St, Demipho, have you paid him the money?

Demipho. I looked after that at once.

Chremes. I wish you had n't. Oh! I see my wife! I had almost said too much.

Demipho. Why do you wish I had n't paid it, Chremes?

Chremes. It does n't matter.

Demipho. What do you mean? Have you been talking to the girl on whose account we're bringing Nausistrata?

Chremes. I've settled it all.

Demipho. What does she say?

Chremes. She can't be taken away.

Demipho. Why can't she?

Chremes. Because they're in love with one another.

Demipho. Well, what's that to us?

Chremes. A great deal; and, besides, I find that she's related to us.

Demipho. What? You're raving.

Chremes. You'll find it so. I know what I'm saying; I've just recalled the matter.

Demipho. Are you in your right mind?

Nausistrata. Oh, I pray you, don't wrong a kinswoman.

Demipho. She is n't a kinswoman.

Chremes. Don't contradict me. Her father went under a different name; that's how you made the mistake.

Demipho. Did n't she know her father?

Chremes. Yes.

Demipho. Then why did she call him by a wrong name?

Chremes. Won't you ever give in or understand?

Demipho. How can I understand when you tell me nothing?

Chremes. There you go again.

Nausistrata. I wonder what all this is about?

Demipho. I'm sure I don't know.

Chremes. Do you want to know? Well, the girl has no nearer relatives than you and I, and that's the truth.

Demipho. Good Heavens! let's go to her. I want all of us to know the right and wrong of the case together.

Chremes. Oh, Demipho!

Demipho. What's the matter?

Chremes. To think that you should have so little faith in me!

Demipho. Oh, you want me to believe you, do you? You want me to stop asking questions? Well, so be it. But what about our friend's daughter?

Chremes. That's all right.

Demipho. Then are we to send Nausistrata away?

Chremes. Of course.

Demipho. And Phanium is to stay?

Chremes. Yes.

Demipho. Then you may go home, Nausistrata.

Nausistrata. And indeed I think that her staying is a much better arrangement for all of us than what you intended at first. I thought her a very well-bred girl, when I saw her. [Exit into CHREMES' house.]

Demipho. Now, what's all this about?

Chremes. Has she shut the door yet?

Demipho. Yes.

Chremes. Heavens, what luck! I've found my daughter married to your son.

Demipho. Eh! how could that be?

Chremes. I can't explain here. It's not safe.

Demipho. Well, come inside, then.

Chremes. I tell you I don't want even our sons to know this. [Exeunt into DEMIPHO'S house.

SCENE 4.

Enter ANTIPHO.

Antipho. However my own affairs may turn out, I'm glad my cousin has got what he wanted. How shrewd to have a love affair of the kind that when things go wrong, a remedy is possible! As soon as Phaedria found the money, all his troubles were at an end; but I can't by any device free myself from my difficulties. To keep my secret means to live in dread; to reveal it, disgrace. I shouldn't go home now, if some hope of keeping her hadn't been held out to me. But where can I find Geta?

SCENE 5.

Enter PHORMIO.

Phormio (not seeing ANTIPHO). I've received the money, paid it over to the slave-trader, and taken the girl away. I've seen that Phaedria has her for his very own; she's been set free. Now, I've still one thing left to do, and that's to get away from the old gentlemen for a spree. That's how I'll spend the next few days.

Antipho. Why, there's Phormio. Say!

Phormio. What?

Antipho. Tell me Phaedria's plans. What does he intend to do?

Phormio. He's going to play your rôle.

Antipho. My rôle?

Phormio. Yes, keep out of his father's sight. He's asked that you play his, and plead his cause, for he's coming to my house to take a few drinks. I'll tell the old gentlemen that I'm going to the fair at Sunium to buy that slave girl whom Geta was talking about just now, so that when they miss me they won't think that I'm squandering their money. But listen, there's some one at your door.

Antipho. See who's coming out.

Phormio. It's Geta.

SCENE 6.

Enter GETA from DEMIPHO'S house.

GETA (not seeing the others). O Fortune! O lucky Fortune! What blessings you have showered on my master Antipho this day!

Antipho. What does the fellow mean?

Geta. And freed us, his friends, from fear! But I'm wasting time in not throwing my cloak over my shoulder,¹ and hurrying to tell him what has befallen him.

Antipho (to PHORMIO). Do you understand what he's talking about?

Phormio. No, do you?

Antipho. No, not a word.

Phormio. No more do I.

¹ The cloak was thrown back over the shoulder to make running easier.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Geta. I'll not speak of that, Antipho, for it has nothing to do with this story. When I was about to enter the women's apartments, the page Midas ran up to me, caught me by the cloak behind, and pulled me back. I looked around, and asked him why he was detaining me; he answered that his mistress could n't be seen — those were his orders. "Sophrona," he said, "has just brought in Chremes, the old man's brother, and he's inside with them now." When I heard this, I proceeded to go quietly up to the door on tiptoe — reached it — stood there — held my breath — put my ear close to: so I began to listen, trying in this way to catch what they were saying.

Antipho. Brave, Geta!

Geta. There I heard this glorious thing, so that I all but shouted aloud for joy.

Antipho. What was it?

Geta. What do you think?

Antipho. I don't know.

Geta. Well, it's a truly wonderful story. Your uncle turns out to be your wife's father.

Antipho. Eh, what do you say?

Geta. He had a clandestine affair with her mother at Lemnos.

Phormio. It's a dream. Can we suppose that she did n't know her own father?

Geta. There was some reason for that, Phormio, you may be sure; but do you think that outside the door I could understand everything that was going on inside?

Antipho. As a matter of fact, I've had an inkling of that tale too.

Geta. Well, I'll give you a proof to make you believe it. While this was going on your uncle crossed over from that house to this; presently he went back again with your father. They both say that they consent to your keeping her. And, to clinch the matter, I've been sent to find you and to take you to them.

Antipho. Then away with me instantly! Why don't you go?

Geta. I will.

Antipho. Good-by, my dear Phormio.

Phormio. Good-by, Antipho. It's turned out well, so help me Heaven!

[Exeunt ANTIPHO and GETA to DEMIPHO'S house.]

SCENE 7.

Phormio. I'm glad that these two have had such an unexpected piece of luck. Now I have an excellent chance of outwitting the old gentlemen and relieving Phaedria of his financial worries, so that he won't have to ask favors of any of his friends; for this money shall be given to him just as it was given to me, whether they like it or not. I've found in the facts of the case the means to make them give it. Now I must assume a new bearing and expression. I'll go into this alley hard by, and come out upon them when they leave the house. I'm not going to the fair, as I pretended. [Withdraws into alley.]

SCENE 8.

Enter DEMIPHO and CHREMES from the former's house.

Demipho. Brother, I am indeed truly thankful to Heaven for this satisfactory settlement.

Chremes. Is n't she a lady, as I said?

Demipho. She certainly is. Now we must get hold of Phormio as soon as possible, and get our thirty minae away from him before he squanders them.

Phormio (coming forward). I should like to see Demipho, if he's at home, to —

Demipho. Why, we were just going to you, Phormio.

Phormio. For the same reason, perhaps?

Demipho. Yes.

Phormio. That's what I thought. And why were you coming to me?

Demipho. Such a question!

Phormio. Did you think that I would n't do what I had once undertaken? Now, mark you, I may be poor, but I've always made a point of preserving my honor. So I've come to you, Demipho, to say that I'm ready. Give me my wife as soon as you please, for on seeing how you had set your hearts on this I deferred all other business, as it was right I should.

Demipho. But my brother here has counselled me not to give her to you. "Think," he says, "what a scandal it will make, if you do; she was n't given before, when it might have been done honorably, and it's a shame to drive her out of doors now as a divorced woman." He used pretty nearly the same arguments as you did to me a little while ago.

Phormio. You're treating me pretty cavalierly.

Demipho. How so?

Phormio. Do you ask? Because I shan't be able to marry the other girl either, for how could I have the face to go back to her whom I jilted?

Chremes (aside to DEMIPHO). Say, "Besides, I see that Antipho does n't want to part with her."

Demipho. Besides, I see that my son does n't want to part with his wife. But, Phormio, pray come to the bank, and have that money paid back to me.

Phormio. What! the money I paid out at once to my creditors?

Demipho. What's to be done, then?

Phormio. If you like to give me the girl whom you've promised me, I'll marry her; but if you choose that she should stay with you, her dowry must stay with me; for it's not right that I should be disappointed to suit your convenience, seeing that, on your account, I jilted the other girl, who was bringing me a dowry of the same amount.

Demipho. To perdition with you, you swaggering scoundrel! Do you think that we know so little of you and your doings as that?

Phormio. I'm getting angry.

Demipho. As if you would marry her if she were offered to you!

Phormio. Try me!

Demipho. Your plan was that my son should keep his wife in your house.

Phormio. Pray, what are you talking about?

Demipho. Just you give me my money.

Phormio. No, you give me my wife.

Demipho. Then to court with you.

Phormio. Indeed, if you trouble me any more —

Demipho. What will you do?

Phormio. I? Perhaps you think that I act as champion for dowerless women only? I do the same for women with dowries.

Chremes. What has that to do with us?

Phormio. Oh, nothing. I knew a married woman here in Athens whose husband —

Chremes. Eh?

Demipho. What's that?

Phormio. Had another wife in Lemnos.

Chremes. I'm a lost man.

Phormio. And he had a daughter by her, whom he brought up secretly.

Chremes. I'm dead and buried.

Phormio. So I'm going now to tell her this story.
(Starts towards CHREMES' house.)

Chremes. I entreat you, don't.

Phormio. Oho! were you the man?

Demipho. How he mocks us!

Chremes. We grant you a quittance.

Phormio. Oh, nonsense!

Chremes. What more do you want? We make you a present of the money that you have.

Phormio. Yes, yes! You silly old men, what the mischief do you mean by playing with me in this way, like children that don't know their own minds? "I will" and "I won't" — "I will," and then again "I won't" — "take her," "give her up," — "what has been said is all unsaid; the bargain which has just been struck is void."

Chremes (to DEMIPHO). How or from whom did he learn this?

Demipho (to CHREMES). I don't know, but I'm quite sure that I did n't tell anybody.

Chremes (to DEMIPHO). So help me Heaven, it's like a miracle.

Phormio (aside). I've put a spoke in their wheel.

Demipho (to CHREMES). Come, is this fellow to carry off so large a sum of money from us, and laugh at us so openly? Better to die, by Heaven! Prepare to act boldly, and with presence of mind. You see that your transgression has got abroad, and you can't keep it from your wife any longer. Now, Chremes, the best way to win forgiveness is to tell her ourselves what she's certain to learn some day from others; then we shall be able to take vengeance on this scoundrel in our own way.

Phormio (aside). Hello! unless I keep a sharp lookout I'll be in a fix; they're coming at me with the spirit of gladiators.

Chremes (to DEMIPHO). But I'm afraid she'll never forgive me.

Demipho (to CHREMES). Cheer up, I'll restore you to favor with her, Chremes. There's the fact that the girl's mother has passed away to fall back upon.

Phormio. So this is how you treat me? A clever enough plan of attack! But, Demipho, you've done your brother no good in goading me on. (To CHREMES.) What! after amusing yourself as you pleased in foreign parts, and showing so little respect to your wife here, a lady of birth too, as to insult her in this outrageous way, you mean to go whining to her for forgiveness, do you? By telling her the whole story, I'll so kindle her wrath that you'll never quench the flames, even though you dissolved in tears.

Demipho. To think of any man being so impudent! The scoundrel ought to be transported at the public expense to some desert land.

Chremes. He's got me in so tight a place that I really don't know what to do with him.

Demipho. I know; let's go to law.

Phormio. To law, certainly. In this court, if you please. (Goes towards CHREMES' house.)

Chremes. After him! Hold him back, while I call the slaves out! (DEMIPHO takes hold of PHORMIO.)

Demipho. But I can't hold him alone; come and help me. (CHREMES takes hold of PHORMIO.)

Phormio (to DEMIPHO). One action for assault against you.

Demipho. Go to law, then.

Phormio. Another against you, Chremes.

Chremes. Drag him away.

Phormio. Is that your game? then I must use my voice. Nausistrata, come forth.

Chremes. Stop his vile mouth; see how strong he is!

Phormio. Nausistrata, I say!

Demipho. Won't you be quiet?

Phormio. I be quiet?

Demipho. If he won't come along, punch him in the belly.

Phormio. Or knock his eye out; the time is coming when I shall have a fine revenge on you.

SCENE 9.

Enter NAUSISTRATA from CHREMES' house.

Nausistrata. Who's calling me? Why, husband, what in the world is all this disturbance about?

Phormio (to CHREMES). Well, why do you stand like a mute?

Nausistrata. Who's this man? Why don't you answer me?

Phormio. He answer you! Why, he does n't know where he is.

Chremes. Mind you, don't believe a word he says.

Phormio. Go up to him, touch him; if he is n't in a cold sweat all over, you may kill me.

Chremes. It's all a lie.

Nausistrata. What's a lie? What story is he telling?

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Nausistrata. A wicked and terrible thing, by the immortal gods!

Phormio (overhearing CHREMES). Do? There's nothing left to do.

Phormio. Was there ever anything more disgraceful?

Nausistrata. I address you, Demipho, for it makes me sick to talk to that creature. Was this the reason of his travelling so often to Lemnos and staying there so long? Was this the cause of the fall in prices which brought down our income?

Demipho. Nausistrata, I admit that he deserves blame in this matter, but it is n't an unpardonable offence.

Phormio (aside). He's pleading for the dead.

Demipho. It was n't, you must understand, because he was tired of you, or because he disliked you, that he did this. It all happened about fifteen years ago. He had been drinking when he met the woman. This girl was born, but he never had anything to do with the mother afterwards. She's dead and gone now; the only difficulty is removed. So, I beg you, be patient in this, as you have been in all other matters.

Nausistrata. I patient? I am indeed sorely anxious that this should be his last offence, but how can I hope for that? Am I to suppose that he will grow steadier as he grows older? Why, he was old when he did it; so much for years bringing steadiness! Are my looks and age likely to be more attractive to him now than they were then, Demipho? What grounds do you give me for expecting or hoping that he won't do it again?

Phormio. Now's the time for all who would attend the funeral of Chremes! That's the way I'll give it to him. Such is the fate of those who attack Phormio, so let any one who likes come on, and I'll lay him as low as this man here. But I'm willing that he should be pardoned; he's had punishment enough to satisfy me. His wife has something to din into his ears as long as he lives.

Nausistrata. Well, I've deserved this, I suppose. What's the good of my telling you now in detail, Demipho, what a good wife I've been to him?

Demipho. I know it all as well as you do.

Nausistrata. Then do you think that I deserved such treatment?

Demipho. Not in the least. But seeing that what's done can't be undone by reproaches, forgive him. He begs your pardon, acknowledges his sin, and makes a clean breast of it. What more do you want?

Phormio (aside). Before she forgives him, I must look out for myself and for Phaedria. Look here, Nausistrata, before you give any rash answer, listen to me.

Nausistrata. What have you to say?

Phormio. I got thirty minae out of him by a trick; I've given them to your son, who has bought his mistress with them from a slave-trader.

Chremes. Eh, what's that you say?

Nausistrata. Pray, do you think it such a heinous crime that your son, who is a young man, should have a mistress, while you have two wives? Have you no shame? Will you have the face to blame him? Answer me.

Demipho. He'll do as you wish.

Nausistrata. No, to tell you my feeling in the matter, I don't mean to pardon him or to make any promise, or even to give an answer, until I've seen my son ; I leave it all to him to decide ; I 'll do what he bids me.

Phormio. You 're a sensible woman, Nausistrata.

Nausistrata (to CHREMES). Are you satisfied with that ?

Chremes. Yes. (Aside.) I 'm coming off finely, — much better than I expected.

Nausistrata. Tell me your name.

Phormio. Phormio, a friend of your family, and especially of your son Phaedria.

Nausistrata. Well, Phormio, I assure you, after this I 'll do whatever I can for you, both in word and deed.

Phormio. You 're very kind.

Nausistrata. Not at all, you deserve it.

Phormio. Would you like, Nausistrata, to do something to-day that would please me, and at the same time vex your husband's sight ?

Nausistrata. I certainly should.

Phormio. Then invite me to dinner.

Nausistrata. Indeed I do.

Demipho. Let 's go inside, then.

Nausistrata. Yes, but where's Phaedria, our judge ?

Phormio. I 'll have him here presently.

[Exeunt PHORMIO towards the forum, the others into CHREMES' house.]

*Cantor*¹ (to the audience). Farewell, and give us your applause.

¹ The cantor, whose principal function was to sing the lyrical parts of the play, always spoke the last words.

LUCRETIUS

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

ST. JEROME in his Chronicle places the birth of Lucretius in the year 94, adding that after having become insane by drinking a love philtre he wrote some books in the lucid intervals of his madness; that he committed suicide in his forty-fourth year, and that Cicero revised his work. From other sources it seems probable that 97 and not 94 was the year of the poet's birth. The remaining statements of St. Jerome's notice are likewise open to grave question. The story of the love philtre may be dismissed without discussion; and there is no confirmation of the assertions concerning his madness and suicide. The Cicero mentioned is probably the famous orator, but even this is uncertain.

His poem On the Nature of Things consists of six books, and is an exposition of the doctrines of the Epicurean philosophy. The first two books are devoted to the atomic theory in its more general aspects. Starting from the two fundamental principles that nothing is produced from nothing and that nothing returns to nothing, he explains the existence of the universe, of all forms of life, of all natural phenomena, as due to the chance combination of an infinite number of atoms moving in an infinite void. The atoms have existed from all eternity, and are indestructible. They are of extreme minuteness, indivisible, and imperceptible by any of the senses. Having an inherent power of deflection they swerve from the straight line as they fall, and, colliding, combine in forms of manifold variety. The third book deals with the constitution of the soul, which is, like everything else, material, consisting of small round atoms of unusual fineness. It cannot exist apart from the body. In the fourth book we have a treatment of sense perceptions; in the fifth, of the formation of the world, the origin of life, and the development of man; in the sixth, of such natural phenomena as thunder, lightning, and earthquakes. The poem concludes with an account of the plague at Athens.

It was not, however, so much the theory of Epicurus that attracted Lucretius as its practical application. In his view of life there were two principal causes of unhappiness: belief in the interference of the gods in the affairs of the world, and fear of death. He welcomed the Epicurean philosophy, because, as he believed, it proved that both were groundless. Epicurus did, it is true, believe in the existence of gods, but the atomic theory excluded them from all part in the creation and management of the world. They lived in perfect tranquillity somewhere in the vast spaces between the worlds, and paid no attention to terrestrial things. There was accordingly no reason why men should dread them. In the same way, the soul having been proved to be subject to immediate disintegration on separating from the body, death should have no more terrors.

The most conspicuous feature of the book is the poet's splendid enthusiasm. His theme does not at first sight seem to be an inspiring one, but the atomic theory came to him as a revelation, and the realization of what it meant for him and for all who would believe filled him with a sort of frenzy. He had what the Greeks called μανία, possession, something stronger than inspiration as ordinarily used, and this, carrying him without a sign of weariness through long and intricate disquisitions on details of the theory, manifests itself every now and then with increased intensity in some arraignment of religion so-called, or some fine piece of descriptive writing, or a glorification of Epicurus. All his references to the master show a rare earnestness. Epicurus is to him something more than mortal, — something of a god. He it was who first pointed out the way of truth, who showed a light in the darkness, who made happiness possible for men. The ultra sombre, almost morbid view of life that we find in many passages of the poem is in part due to the same impassioned zeal for the doctrines he was preaching; for while his keen sense of the misery and suffering in the world had much to do with his embracing Epicureanism in the first place, the enthusiasm with which he embraced it tended to make him exaggerate the evils which he was combatting. The note sounded in the second book (v. 578 seq.), “nor did night ever follow day, or morning night, that heard not, mingling with the cries of sickly infants, wailings the attendants on death and black funeral” recurs again and again. In depicting the different phases of nature he stands in the first rank among Roman poets. His descriptions, introduced from time to time to relieve the tension of philosophic argument, are marked by an accuracy, a truthfulness, a startling vividness, that could come only from highly trained powers of observation; but they have besides the charm which springs from a genuine feeling for the beauty of the external world. Nor does the compression which so many of them show detract at all from their effectiveness. The “shells that paint the lap of earth, where the sea with gentle waves beats on the thirsty sand of the winding shore,” the “grey-green strip of olives running between vineyards,” — such descriptions as these linger in the memory, when more elaborate pictures might fail.

On the side of language Lucretius was hampered by the fact that Latin had not in his time developed a philosophical vocabulary. So we find him complaining of the “poverty of the Latin language.” The Latin hexameter, too, was a medium which, although it had been used before by Ennius, had not as yet attained to any very great degree of flexibility.

INVOCATION TO VENUS¹

(I., 1-43.)

MOTHER of the Aeneadae,² darling of men and gods, increase-giving Venus, who beneath the gliding signs of heaven fillest with thy presence the ship-carrying sea, the corn-bearing lands, since through thee every kind of living things is conceived, rises up and beholds the light of the sun. Before thee, goddess, flee the winds, the clouds of heaven; before thee and thy advent; for thee earth manifold in works puts forth sweet-smelling flowers; for thee the levels of the sea do laugh and heaven propitiated shines with outspread light. For soon as the vernal aspect of day is disclosed, and the birth favoring breath of favonius³ unbarred is blowing fresh, first the fowls of the air, O lady, shew signs of thee and thy entering in, thoroughly smitten in heart by thy power. Next the wild herds bound over the glad pastures and swim the rapid rivers: in such wise each made prisoner by thy charm follows thee with desire, whither thou goest to lead it on. Yes, throughout seas and mountains and sweeping rivers and leafy homes of birds and grassy plains, striking fond love into the breasts of all thou constrainest them each after its kind to continue their races with desire. Since thou then art sole mistress of the nature of things, and without thee nothing rises up into the divine borders of light, nothing grows to be glad or lovely, I would have thee for a helpmate in writing the verses which I essay to pen on the nature

¹ Venus is invoked as the procreative power in nature.

² The Romans. According to legend Aeneas, son of Venus, was the founder of the Roman race.

³ The west wind.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Nor was one found to break that thraldom fell
 Until a man of Greece dared lift his eyes, 65
 One whom no vengeful thunderbolts could quell
 Nor wrath of gods. But on his high emprise,
 Chafed to sublimer daring and intent,
 To burst through Nature's portals forth he went.

Thus his undaunted spirit for mankind 70
 O'er Superstition's power the victory won ;
 Past the world's flaming walls his venturous mind
 Through the unmeasured universe pressed on ;
 Thence brought us word how Being is defined
 By bounds fast set which nothing may o'er-run. 75
 So trampled under foot Religion lies
 While Science soars victorious to the skies.

Nor deem it sin by Reason to be freed,
 Or think I lead thee an unholy way ;
 Rather to many a dark and bloody deed 80
 Religion hurries those who own her sway.
 Was not Iphigenia doomed to bleed
 By the Greek chiefs, though first of men were they,
 Staining the altar of the Trivian Maid
 At Aulis where the fleet by winds was stayed? 85

Lo ! on her tresses fair for bridal tire
 The sacrificial fillet they have bound ;
 Beside the altar weeping stands her sire :
 In all the crowd no tearless eye is found.
 The priests make ready for their office dire, 90
 Yet pitying hide the knife. When gazing round
 The Maiden sees her doom, her spirit dies,
 Her limbs sink down, speechless on earth she lies.

The firstborn of his children she in vain
 Had brought the name of father to the king. 95
 In arms upborne she goes, not by a train
 Of youths that the loud hymeneal sing
 Around a happy bride in joyous strain
 Bearing her home, but a sad offering,
 There to be slain by him who gave her birth. 100
 Such evil hath Religion wrought on earth.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

ATOMS AND VOID

(I., 503-550.)

FIRST of all then, since there has been found to exist a two-fold and widely dissimilar nature of two things, that is to say of body and of place in which things severally go on, each of the two must exist for and by itself and quite unmixed. For wherever there is empty space which we call void, there body is not; wherever again body maintains itself, there empty void nowise exists. First bodies¹ therefore are solid and without void. Again since there is void in things begotten, solid matter must exist about this void, and no thing can be proved by true reason to conceal in its body and have within it void, unless you choose to allow that that which holds it in is solid. Again that can be nothing but a union of matter which can keep in the void of things. Matter therefore, which consists of a solid body, may be everlasting, though all things else are dissolved. Moreover if there were no empty void, the universe would be solid; unless on the other hand there were certain bodies to fill up whatever places they occupied, the existing universe would be empty and void space. Therefore sure enough body and void are marked off in alternate layers, since the universe is neither of a perfect fulness nor a perfect void. There are, therefore certain bodies which can vary void space with full. These can neither be broken in pieces by the stroke of blows from without, nor have their texture undone by aught piercing to their core nor give way before any other kind of assault; as we have proved to you a little before. For without void nothing seems to admit of being crushed in or broken up or split in two by cutting, or of taking in wet or permeating cold or penetrating fire, by which all things are destroyed. And the more anything contains within it of void, the more thoroughly it gives way to the assault of these things. Therefore if first bodies are as I have shown solid and without void, they must be everlasting. Again unless matter had been eternal, all things before this would have utterly returned to nothing and whatever things we see would have been born anew from nothing. But since I have proved above that nothing can be produced from nothing, and that what is begotten cannot be recalled to nothing, first beginnings must be of an imperishable body, into which all things can be dissolved at their last hour, that there may be a supply of matter for the reproduction of things. Therefore first-beginnings are of solid singleness, and in no other way can they have been preserved through ages during infinite time past in order to reproduce things.

¹ The atoms.

H. A. J. MUNRO.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO EPICURUS¹

(II., 1 seq.)

I.

WHEN storms blow loud, 't is sweet to watch at ease
From shore, the sailor laboring with the seas :

Because the sense, not that such pains are his,
But that they are not ours, must always please.

II.

Sweet for the cragsman, from some high retreat
Watching the plains below where legions meet,

To wait the moment when the walls of war
Thunder and clash together. But more sweet,

III.

Sweeter by far on Wisdom's rampired height
To pace serene the porches of the light,

And thence look down — down on the purblind herd
Seeking and never finding in the night

IV.

The road to peace — the peace that all might hold,
But yet is missed by young men and by old,

Lost in the strife for palaces and powers,
The axes, and the lictors, and the gold.

V.

Oh sightless eyes ! Oh hands that toil in vain !
Not such your needs. Your nature's needs are twain,

¹ This selection bears on the principal aim of Epicurean ethics, — to teach men how best to live in peace and tranquillity. The version is taken from Mr. Mallock's Lucretius on Life and Death, in the metre of Omar Khayyám.

And only twain : and these are to be free —
Your minds from terror, and your bones from pain.

VI.

Unailing limbs, a calm unanxious breast —
Grant Nature these, and she will do the rest.

Nature will bring you, be you rich or poor,
Perhaps not much — at all events her best.

VII.

What though no statued youths from wall and wall
Strew light along your midnight festival,

With golden hands, nor beams from Lebanon
Keep the lyre's languor lingering through the hall,

VIII.

Yours is the table 'neath the high-whispering trees ;
Yours is the lyre of leaf and stream and breeze,

The golden flagon, and the echoing dome —
Lapped in the Spring, what care you then for these ?

IX.

Sleep is no sweeter on the ivory bed
Than yours on moss ; and fever's shafts are sped
As clean through silks damasked for dreaming kings,

As through the hood that wraps the poor man's head.

X.

What then, if all the prince's glittering store
Yields to his body not one sense the more,

Nor any ache or fever of them all
Is barred out by bronze gates or janitor —

XI.

What shall the palace, what the proud domain
Do for the mind — vain splendors of the vain ?

How shall these minister to a mind diseased,
Or raze one written trouble from the brain ?

XII.

Unless you think that conscience, with its stings
And misery, fears the outward pomp of things —

Fears to push swords and sentinels aside,
And sit the assessor of the king of kings.

XIII.

The mind ! Ay — there 's the rub. The root is there
Of that one malady which all men share.

It gleams between the haggard lids of joy ;
It burns a canker in the heart of care.

XIV.

Within the gold bowl, when the feast is set,
It lurks. 'T is bitter in the laborer's sweat.

Feed thou the starving, and thou bring'st it back —
Back to the Starving, who alone forget.

XV.

Oh you who under silken curtains lie,
And you whose only roof-tree is the sky,

What is the curse that blights your lives alike ?
Not that you hate to live, but fear to die.

XVI.

Fear is the poison. Wheresoe'er you go,
Out of the skies above, the clouds below,

The sense thrills through you of some pitiless Power
Who scowls at once your father and your foe ;

XVII.

Who lets his children wander at their whim,
Choosing their road, as though not bound by him :

But all their life is rounded with a shade,
And every road goes down behind the rim !

XVIII.

And there behind the rim, the swift, the lame,
At different paces, but their end the same,
Into the dark shall one by one go down,
Where the great furnace shakes its hair of flame.

XIX.

Oh ye who cringe and cower before the throne
Of him whose heart is fire, whose hands are stone,
Who shall deliver you from this death in life —
Strike off your chains, and make your souls your own ?

W. H. MALLOCK.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

(III., 1-30.)

THEE,¹ who first wast able amid such thick darkness to raise on high so bright a beacon and shed a light on the true interests of life, thee I follow, glory of the Greek race, and plant now my footsteps firmly fixed in thy imprinted marks, not so much from a desire to rival thee as that from the love I bear thee I yearn to imitate thee ; for why need the swallow

¹ Epicurus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

THE FEAR OF DEATH ¹(III., 894 seq.)

“No more shall look upon thy face
Sweet spouse, no more with emulous race
Sweet children court their sire’s embrace.”²

“To their soft touch right soon no more
Thy pulse shall thrill; e’en now is o’er
Thy stewardship, Death is at the door.

“One dark day wresteth every prize
From hapless man in hapless wise,
Yea, e’en the pleasure of his eyes.”

Thus men bewail their piteous lot; 10
Yet should they add, “’T is all forgot,
These things the dead man recketh not.”

Yea, could they knit for them this chain
Of words and reasons, men might gain
Some dull narcotic for their pain, 15

Saying, “The dead are dead indeed;
The dead, from all heart-sickness freed,
Sleep and shall sleep and take no heed.”

Lo, if dumb Nature found a voice,
Would she bemoan, and not make choice 20
To bid poor mortals to rejoice,

¹ The use of the metre of Tennyson’s Two Voices was suggested to Mr. Tyrrell by the similarity of theme. See his Latin Poetry, p. 72. The first three stanzas are put into the mouth of some friend of the deceased, while the rest of the selection gives the Epicurean view.

² Comparison with Gray’s Elegy is inevitable.

Saying, "Why weep thy wane, O man?
Wert joyous e'en when life began,
When thy youth's sprightly freshets ran?"

"Nay, all the joys thy life e'er knew 25
As poured into a sieve fell through,
And left thee but to rail and rue."

Go, fool, as doth a well-filled guest
Sated of life: with tranquil breast
Take thine inheritance of rest. 30

Why seekest joys that soon must pale
Their feeble fires, and swell the tale
Of things of nought and no avail?

Die, sleep! For all things are the same;
Tho' spring now stir thy crescent frame, 35
'T will wither: all things are the same.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE HONEY OF THE MUSES

(IV., 1-25.)

I TRAVERSE the pathless haunts of the Pierides¹ never yet trodden by sole of man. I love to approach the untasted springs and to quaff, I love to cull fresh flowers and gather for my head a distinguished crown from spots whence the muses have yet veiled the brows of none; first because I teach of great things and essay to release the mind from the fast bonds of religious scruples, and next because on a dark subject I pen such lucid verses o'erlaying all with the muses' charm.

¹ The muses.

For that too would seem to be not without good grounds: even as physicians when they propose to give nauseous wormwood to children, first smear the rim round the bowl with the sweet yellow juice of honey, that the unthinking age of children may be fooled as far as the lips, and meanwhile drink up the bitter draught of wormwood and though beguiled yet not betrayed, but rather by such means recover health and strength: so I now, since this doctrine seems generally somewhat bitter to those by whom it has not been handled, and the multitude shrinks back from it in dismay, have resolved to set forth to you our doctrine in sweet-toned Pierian verse and overlay it as it were with the pleasant honey of the muses, if happily by such means I might engage your mind on my verses, till such time as you apprehend all the nature of things and thoroughly feel what use it has.

H. A. J. MUNRO.

LOVE'S EXTRAVAGANCE¹

(IV., 1121-1191.)

THEN too they² waste their strength and ruin themselves by the labor, then too their life is passed at the beck of another. Meanwhile their estate runs away and is turned into Babylonian coverlets; duties are neglected and their good name staggers and sickens. On her feet laugh elastic and beautiful Sicyonian³ shoes, yes, and large emeralds with green light are set in gold and the sea-colored dress is worn constantly and much

¹ Love finds a place in Lucretius's poem as one of the phenomena connected with the senses, which constitute the theme of the fourth book.

² He has been speaking of lovers.

³ From Sicyon, a town in the northeast of the Peloponnesus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

deformed and ugly to be objects of endearment and held in the highest admiration. And one lover jeers at others and advises them to propitiate Venus, since they are troubled by a disgraceful passion, and often, poor wretch, gives no thought to his own ills, greatest of all. The black is a brune, the filthy and rank has not the love of order; the cat-eyed is a miniature Pallas, the stringy and wizened a gazelle; the dumpy and dwarfish is one of the graces, from top to toe all grace; the big and overgrown is awe-inspiring and full of dignity. She is tongue-tied, cannot speak, then she has a lisp; the dumb is bashful; then the fire-spit, the teasing, the gossiping, turns to a shining lamp. One becomes a slim darling then when she cannot live from want of flesh; and she is only spare, who is half dead with cough. Then the fat and big-breasted is a Ceres' self big-breasted from Iacchus;¹ the pug-nosed is a she Silenus and a satyress; the thick-lipped a very kiss. It were tedious to attempt to report other things of the kind. Let her however be of ever so great dignity of appearance; such that the power of Venus goes forth from all her limbs; yet there are others too; yet have we lived without her before; yet does she do, and we know that she does, in all things the same as the ugly woman; and fumigates herself, poor wretch, with nauseous perfumes, her very maids running from her and giggling behind her back. But the lover, when shut out, often in tears covers the threshold with flowers and wreaths, and anoints the haughty doorposts with oil of marjoram and imprints kisses, poor wretch, on the doors. When, however, he has been admitted, if on his approach but one single breath should come in his way, he would seek specious reasons for departing, and the long-conned deep-drawn complaint would fall to the ground ; and then he would blame his folly, on seeing that he had attributed to her more than it is right to concede to a mortal. Nor is this unknown to our Venuses ; wherefore all the more they themselves hide with the utmost pains all that goes on behind the scenes of life from those whom they wish to retain in the chains of love ; but in vain, since you may yet draw forth from her mind into the light all these things and search into all her smiles ; and if she is of a fair mind and not troublesome, overlook them in your turn and make allowance for human failings.

¹ Bacchus, who was, according to one account, the son of Ceres.

H. A. J. MUNRO.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MAN¹

(V., 925-1457.)

BUT the race of man then in the fields was much hardier, as beseemed it to be, since the hard earth had produced it ; and built on a groundwork of larger and more solid bones within, knit with powerful sinews throughout the frame of flesh ; not lightly to be disabled by heat or cold or strange kinds of food or any malady of body. And during the revolution of many lustres of the sun through heaven they led a life after the roving fashion of wild beasts. No one then was a sturdy guider of the bent plough or knew how to labor the fields with iron or plant in the ground young saplings or lop with pruning-hooks old boughs

¹ The importance of man's place in the nature of things is recognized by this long section at the end of the fifth book, in which the development of the race is traced through all the stages from primitive savagery to civilization and culture.

from the high trees. What the sun and rains had given, what the earth had produced spontaneously, was guerdon sufficient to content their hearts. Among acorn-bearing oaks they would refresh their bodies for the most part; and the arbut-berries which you now see in the winter-time ripen with a bright scarlet hue, the earth would then bear in greatest plenty and of a larger size; and many coarse kinds of food besides the teeming freshness of the world then bare, more than enough for poor wretched men. But rivers and springs invited to slake thirst, even as now a rush of water down from the great hills summons with clear splash far and wide the thirsty races of wild beasts. Then too as they ranged about they would occupy the well-known woodland haunts of the nymphs, out of which they knew that smooth-gliding streams of water with a copious gush bathed the dripping rocks, trickling down over the green moss; and in parts welled and bubbled out over the level plain. And as yet they knew not how to apply fire to their purposes or to make use of skins and clothe their body in the spoils of wild beasts, but they would dwell in woods and mountain-caves and forests and shelter in the brushwood their squalid limbs when driven to shun the buffeting of the winds and the rains. And they were unable to look to the general weal and knew not how to make a common use of any customs or laws. Whatever prize fortune threw in his way, each man would bear off, trained at his own discretion to think of himself and live for himself alone. And Venus would join the bodies of lovers in the woods; for each woman was gained over either by mutual desire, or the headstrong violence and vehement lust of the man, or a bribe of some acorns and arbut-berries or choice

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

some sores would summon death with appalling cries, until cruel gripings had rid them of life, forlorn of help, unwitting what wounds wanted. But then a single day gave not over to death many thousands of men marching with banners spread, nor did the stormy waters of the sea dash on the rocks men and ships. At this time the sea would often rise up and rage without aim, without purpose, without result, and just as lightly put off its empty threats ; nor could the winning wiles of the calm sea treacherously entice any one to his ruin with laughing waters, when the reckless craft of the skipper had not yet risen into the light. Then too want of food would consign to death their fainting frames, now on the contrary 't is plenty sinks into ruin. They unwittingly would often pour out poison for themselves ; now with nicer skill men give it to their son's wife instead.

Next after they had got themselves huts and skins and fire, and the woman united with the man passed with him into one domicile and the duties of wedlock were learnt by the two, and they saw an offspring born from them, then first mankind began to soften. For fire made their chilled bodies less able now to bear the frost beneath the canopy of heaven, and Venus impaired their strength and children with their caresses soon broke down the haughty temper of parents. Then too neighbors began to join in a league of friendship, mutually desiring neither to do nor suffer harm ; and asked for indulgence to children and womankind, when with cries and gestures they declared in stammering speech that meet it is for all to have mercy on the weak. And though harmony could not be established without exception, yet a very large portion observed their agreements with good faith, or else the race of man would then have been wholly cut off, nor could breeding have continued their generations to this day.

But nature impelled them to utter the various sounds of the tongue and use struck out the names of things, much in the same way as the inability to speak is seen in its turn to drive children to the use of gestures, when it forces them to point with the finger at the things which are before them. For every one feels how far he can make use of his peculiar powers. Ere the horns of a calf are formed and project from his forehead, he butts with it when angry and pushes out in his rage. Then whelps of panthers and cubs of lions fight with claws and feet and teeth at a time when teeth and claws are hardly yet formed. Again we see every kind of fowl trust to wings and seek from pinions a fluttering succor. Therefore to suppose that some one man at that time apportioned names to things, and that men from him learnt their first words, is sheer folly. For why should this particular man be able to denote all things by words and to utter the various sounds of the tongue, and yet at the same time others be supposed not to have been able to do so? Again if others as well as he had not made use of words among themselves, whence was implanted in this man the previous conception of its use, and whence was given to him the original faculty, to know and perceive in mind what he wanted to do? Again one man could not constrain and subdue and force many to choose to learn the names of things. It is no easy thing in any way to teach and convince the deaf of what is needful to be done; for they never would suffer nor in any way endure sounds of voice hitherto unheard to continue to be dinned fruitlessly into their ears.

Lastly what is there so passing strange in this circumstance, that the race of men whose voice and tongue were in full force, should denote things by different words as different feelings prompted? since dumb brutes, yes, and the races of wild beasts are accustomed to give forth distinct and varied sounds, when they have fear or pain and when joys are rife. This you may learn from facts plain to sense: when the large spongy open lips of Molossian¹ dogs begin to growl enraged and bare their hard teeth, thus drawn back in rage they threaten in a tone far different from that in which they bark outright and fill with sounds all the places around. Again when they essay fondly to lick their whelps with their tongue or when they toss them with their feet and snapping at them make a feint with lightly closing teeth of swallowing though with gentle forbearance, they caress them with a yelping sound of a sort greatly differing from that which they utter when left alone in a house they bay, or when they slink away howling from blows with a crouching body. Again is not the neigh, too, seen to differ, when a young stallion in the flower of age rages among the mares smitten by the goads of winged love, and when with wide-stretched nostrils he snorts out the signal to arms, and when as it chances on any other occasion he neighs with limbs all shaking? Lastly the race of fowls and various birds, hawks and osprays and gulls seeking their living in the salt water mid the waves of the sea, utter at a different time noises widely different from those they make when they are fighting for food and struggling with their prey. And some of them change together with the

.¹ The Molossi were a people of Epirus, in the northwest of Greece. Molossian hounds were famous in antiquity.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

orous strength were much esteemed. Afterwards wealth was discovered and gold found out, which soon robbed of their honors strong and beautiful alike ; for men however valiant and beautiful of person generally follow in the train of the richer man. But were a man to order his life by the rules of true reason, a frugal subsistence joined to a contented mind is for him great riches ; for never is there any lack of a little. But men desired to be famous and powerful, in order that their fortunes might rest on a firm foundation and they might be able by their wealth to lead a tranquil life ; but in vain, since in their struggle to mount up to the highest dignities they rendered their path one full of danger ; and even if they reach it, yet envy like a thunderbolt sometimes strikes and dashes men down from the highest point with ignominy into noisome Tartarus ; since the highest summits and those elevated above the level of other things are mostly blasted by envy as by a thunderbolt ; so that far better it is to obey in peace and quiet than to wish to rule with power supreme and be the master of kingdoms. Therefore let men wear themselves out to no purpose and sweat drops of blood, as they struggle on along the straight road of ambition, since they gather their knowledge from the mouths of others and follow after things from hearsay rather than the dictates of their own feelings ; and this prevails not now nor will prevail by and by any more than it has prevailed before.

Kings therefore being slain the old majesty of thrones and proud sceptres were overthrown and laid in the dust, and the glorious badge of the sovereign head bloodstained beneath the feet of the rabble mourned for its high prerogative ; for that is greedily trampled on which before was too much dreaded. It would come then in the end to the lees of uttermost disorder, each man seeking for himself empire and sovereignty. Next a portion of them taught men to elect legal officers, and drew up codes, to induce men to obey the laws. For mankind, tired out with a life of brute force, lay exhausted from its feuds; and therefore the more readily it submitted of its own free will to laws and stringent codes. For as each one moved by anger took measures to avenge himself with more severity than is now permitted by equitable laws, for this reason men grew sick of a life of brute force. Thence fear of punishment mars the prizes of life; for violence and wrong enclose all who commit them in their meshes and do mostly recoil on him whom they began; and it is not easy for him who by his deeds transgresses the terms of the public peace to pass a tranquil and a peaceful existence. For though he eludes God and man, yet he cannot but feel a misgiving that his secret can be kept for ever; seeing that many by speaking in their dreams or in the wanderings of disease have often we are told betrayed themselves and have disclosed their hidden deeds of evil and their sins.

And now what cause has spread over great nations the worship of the divinities of the gods and filled towns with altars and led to the performance of stated sacred rites, rites now in fashion on solemn occasions and in solemn places, from which even now is implanted in mortals a shuddering awe which raises new temples of the gods over the whole earth and prompts men to crowd them on festive days, all this it is not so difficult to explain in words. Even then in sooth the races of mortal men would see in waking mind glorious forms, would see them in sleep of yet more marvellous size of body. To these then they would attribute sense, because they seemed to move their limbs and to utter lofty words suitable to their glorious aspect and surpassing powers. And they would give them life everlasting, because their face would appear before them and their form abide ; yes, and yet without all this because they would not believe that beings possessed of such powers could lightly be overcome by any force. And they would believe them to be preëminent in bliss, because none of them was ever troubled with the fear of death, and because at the same time in sleep they would see them perform many miracles, yet feel on their part no fatigue from the effort. Again they would see the system of heaven and the different seasons of the years come round in regular succession, and could not find out by what cause this was done ; therefore they would seek a refuge in handing over all things to the gods and supposing all things to be guided by their nod. And they placed in heaven the abodes and realms of the gods, because night and moon are seen to roll through heaven, moon, day and night, and night's austere constellations and night-wandering meteors of the sky and flying bodies of flame, clouds, sun, rains, snow, winds, lightnings, hail, and rapid rumblings and loud threatful thunderclaps.

O hapless race of men, when that they charged the gods with such acts and coupled with them bitter wrath ! what groanings did they then beget for themselves, what wounds for us, what tears for our children's children ! No act is it of piety to be often seen with veiled head to turn to a stone and approach every altar and fall prostrate on the ground and spread out

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

up in the furious hurricane he is borne none the less to the shoals of death? so constantly does some hidden power trample on human grandeur and is seen to tread under its heel and make sport for itself of the renowned rods and cruel axes.¹ Again when the whole earth rocks under their feet and towns tumble with the shock or doubtfully threaten to fall, what wonder that mortal men abase themselves and make over to the gods in things here on earth high prerogatives and marvellous powers, sufficient to govern all things?

To proceed, copper and gold and iron were discovered and at the same time weighty silver and the substance of lead, when fire with its heat had burnt up vast forests on the great hills, either by a discharge of heaven's lightning, or else because men waging with one another a forest-war had carried fire among the enemy in order to strike terror, or because drawn on by the goodness of the soil they would wish to clear rich fields, and bring the country into pasture, or else to destroy wild beasts and enrich themselves with the booty; for hunting with the pitfall and with fire came into use before the practice of enclosing the lawn with toils and stirring it with dogs. Whatever the fact is, from whatever cause the heat of flame had swallowed up the forests with a frightful crackling from their very roots and had thoroughly baked the earth with fire, there would run from the boiling veins and collect into the hollows of the ground a stream of silver and gold, as well as of copper and lead. And when they saw these afterwards cool into lumps and glitter on the earth with a brilliant gleam, they would lift them up attracted by the bright and polished lustre, and they would see them to be moulded in a shape the same as the outline of the cavities in which each lay. Then it would strike them that these might be melted by heat and cast in any form or shape soever, and might by hammering out be brought to tapering points of any degree of sharpness and fineness, so as to furnish them with tools and enable them to cut the forests and hew timber and plane smooth the planks, and also to drill and pierce and bore, and they would set about these works just as much with silver and gold at first as with the overpowering strength of stout copper, but in vain, since their force would fail and give way and not be able like copper to stand the severe strain. At that time copper was in higher esteem and gold would be neglected on account of its uselessness, with its dull blunted edge; now copper lies neglected, gold has mounted up to the highest place of honor. Thus time as it goes round changes the seasons of things. That which was in esteem, falls at length into utter disrepute; and then another thing mounts up and issues out of its degraded state and every day is more and more coveted and blossoms forth high in honor when discovered and is in marvelous repute with men.

¹ A bundle of rods enclosing an axe was the emblem of magisterial authority at Rome.

And now, Memmius, it is easy for you to find out yourself in what way the nature of iron was discovered. Arms of old were hands nails and teeth and stones and boughs broken off from the forests, and flame and fire, as soon as they had become known. Afterwards the force of iron and copper was discovered, and the use of copper was known before that of iron, as its nature is easier to work and it is found in greater quantity. With copper they would labor the soil of the earth, with copper stir up the billows of war and deal about wide gaping wounds and seize cattle and lands ; for everything defenceless and unarmed would readily yield to them with arms in hand. Then by slow steps the sword of iron gained ground and the make of the copper sickle became a by-word ; and with iron they began to plough through the earth's soil, and the struggles of wavering war were rendered equal, and the custom of mounting in arms on the back of a horse and guiding him with reins and shewing prowess with the right hand is older than that of tempting the risks of war in a two-horsed chariot ; and yoking a pair of horses is older than yoking four or mounting in arms scythed chariots. Next the Poeni¹ taught the lucan kine² with towered body, hideous of aspect, with snake-like hand, to endure the wounds of war and to disorder the mighty ranks of Mars. Thus sad discord begat one thing after another, to affright nations of men under arms, and every day made some addition to the terrors of war.

They made trial of bulls too in the service of war and essayed to send savage boars against the enemy, and some sent before them valorous lions with armed trainers and courageous keepers to guide them and to hold them in chains ; but in vain since heated with promiscuous slaughter they would disorder in their rage the troops without distinction, shaking all about the frightful crests upon their heads ; and the horsemen were not able to calm the breasts of the horses scared by the roaring and turn them with the bridle upon the enemy. The lionesses with a spring would throw their enraged bodies on all sides and would

¹ The Carthaginians.

² Elephants were so called because the Romans first saw them in Lucania, in southern Italy, in the army of Pyrrhus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

heddles and spindles, shuttles and ringing yarn-beams. And nature impelled men to work up the wool before womankind ; for the male sex in general far excels the other in skill and is much more ingenious ; until the rugged countrymen so upbraided them with it, that they were glad to give it over into the hands of the women and take their share in supporting hard toil, and in such hard work hardened body and hands.

But nature parent of things was herself the first model of sowing and first gave rise to grafting, since berries and acorns dropping from the trees would put forth in due season swarms of young shoots underneath ; and hence also came the fashion of inserting grafts in their stocks and planting in the ground young saplings over the fields. Next they would try another and yet another kind of tillage for their loved piece of land and would see the earth better the wild fruits through genial fostering and kindly cultivation, and they would force the forests to recede every day higher and higher up the hillside and yield the ground below to tilth, in order to have on the uplands and plains meadows tanks runnels cornfields and glad vineyards, and allow a gray-green strip of olives to run between and mark the divisions, spreading itself over hillocks and valleys and plains ; just as you now see richly dight with varied beauty all the ground which they lay out and plant with rows of sweet fruit-trees, and enclose all round with plantations of other goodly trees.

But imitating with the mouth the clear notes of birds was in use long before men were able to sing in tune smooth-running verses and give pleasure to the ear. And the whistlings of the zephyr through the hollows of reeds first taught peasants to blow into hollow stalks. Then step by step they learned sweet plaintive ditties, which the pipe pours forth pressed by the fingers of the players, heard through pathless woods and forests and lawns, through the unfrequented haunts of shepherds and abodes of unearthly calm. These things would soothe and gratify their minds when sated with food ; for then all things of this kind are welcome. Often therefore stretched in groups on the soft grass beside a stream of water under the boughs of a high tree at no great cost they would pleasantly refresh their bodies, above all when the weather smiled and the seasons of the year painted the green grass with flowers. Then went round the jest, the tale, the peals of merry laughter ; for the peasant muse was then in its glory ; then frolick mirth would prompt to entwine head and shoulders with garlands plaited with flowers and leaves, and to advance in the dance out of step and move the limbs clumsily and with clumsy feet beat mother earth ; which would occasion smiles and peals of merry laughter, because all these things then from their greater novelty and strangeness were in high repute, and the wakeful found a solace for want of sleep in this, in drawing out a variety of notes and going through tunes and running over the reeds with curving lip ; whence even at the present day watchmen observe these traditions and have lately learned to keep the proper tune ; and yet for all this receive not a jot more of enjoyment than erst the rugged race of sons of earth received. For that which we have in our hands, if we have known before nothing pleasanter, pleases above all and is thought to be the best ; and as a rule the later discovery of something better spoils the taste for the former things and changes the feelings in regard to all that has gone before. Thus began distaste for the acorn, thus were abandoned those sleeping places strawn with grass and enriched with leaves. The dress too of wild beasts' skin fell into neglect; though I can fancy that in those days it was found to arouse such jealousy that he who first wore it met his death by an ambushade, and after all it was torn in pieces among them and drenched in blood was utterly destroyed and could not be turned to any use. In those times therefore skins, now gold and purple plague men's lives with cares and wear them out with war. And in this methinks the greater blame rests with us; for cold would torture the naked sons of earth without their skins; but us it harms not in the least to do without a robe of purple, spangled with gold and large figures, if only we have a dress of the people to protect us. Mankind therefore ever toils vainly and to no purpose and wastes life in groundless cares, because sure enough they have not learnt what is the true end of getting and up to what point genuine pleasure goes on increasing: this by slow degrees has carried life out into the deep sea and stirred up from their lowest depths the mighty billows of war.

But those watchful guardians sun and moon traversing with their light all round the great revolving sphere of heaven taught men that the seasons of the year came round and that the system was carried on after a fixed plan and fixed order.

Already they would pass their life fenced about with strong towers, and the land, portioned out and marked off by boundaries, be tilled; the sea would be filled with ships scudding under sail; towns have auxiliaries and allies as stipulated by treaty, when poets began to

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

CATULLUS

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

SWEETEST of Roman singers, Catullus has won the hearts of his readers both in ancient and in modern times by his perfect sincerity, his exquisite tenderness, his absolute ingenuousness. Strange anomaly, a love poet with a really great love, he has told his story with simple directness, expressed its varying phases with compelling candor, traced its course, which ran any way but smoothly, with a range of feeling that places his lyrics among the truest and most spontaneous utterances in literature. At once buoyant and moody, with equal capacity for great happiness and for great suffering, his poems show him now striking the stars, now plunged in depths of woe. Yet all told, after reading his "little book," with its alternate sunshine and shadow, it is the more sombre tone that prevails; and the lighter pieces, while of lasting charm in themselves from their exuberance of spirits, their air of good fellowship, their humorous and satirical touches, have another and perhaps, from the point of view of the book as a whole, a still more striking effect in that they act as foils to those poems of the Lesbia group in which the poet's feelings find their most passionate expression. These are of singular intensity, some of them written in the heyday of his hopes and happiness, some in times of doubt and disillusion, some telling of his struggle between his love for Lesbia and his knowledge of her faithlessness, more than one a renunciation, — all examples of genuine self-revelation, the record of a rare spirit who happened upon misfortune.

He was born at Verona in 84 B. C. Almost the whole period of his literary activity, however, was spent in Rome, and it was there that he met Lesbia, as she is called in his poems, who seems to have given the first stimulus to his lyrical gift. While her identity has not been finally determined, it is probable that she was none other than Clodia, the sister of Clodius, the notorious enemy of Cicero. His affair with her lasted about four years, from 61–58. In 57 he joined the suite of the propraetor Memmius, who was going out to Bithynia. On returning to Rome in the following year, he showed an increased interest in politics, bitterly opposing Caesar and his party. There is no reference in his writings to any event later than 54, and it is assumed that he died soon after that year.

Besides the Lesbia lyrics, the verses to different friends, and other occasional pieces, we have a number of epigrams and some longer poems, among which may be mentioned the Marriage of Peleus and Thetis, an epyllion or miniature epic, into which is woven the story of Theseus and Ariadne; the Attis, describing the self-mutilation of a young devotee of Cybele; the Epithalamium of Julia and Manlius, one of the finest products of the poet's genius; and Berenice's Hair, in which the hair itself gives the true history of its elevation from the head of Berenice, the sister, wife, and queen of Ptolemy Euergetes, to a place in the heavens. While these, in contrast to the best of the shorter poems, show in many respects the influence of the tenets of the group of "new poets," among whom Catullus' closest literary friends were, and who, in violent reaction from the standards of the older national school, looked to Alexandrian poetry as the only means of literary salvation, yet there are in almost all of them striking manifestations of those qualities of imagination and true poetic insight which make Catullus one of Rome's greatest poets.

ON THE DEATH OF LESBIA'S SPARROW

(III.)¹

LOVES and Graces mourn with me,
 Mourn, fair youths, where'er ye be!
 Dead my Lesbia's sparrow is,
 Sparrow, that was all her bliss,
 Than her very eyes more dear;
 For he made her dainty cheer,
 Knew her well, as any maid
 Knows her mother, never strayed
 From her bosom, but would go
 Hopping round her, to and fro, 10
 And to her, and her alone,
 Chirrup'd with such pretty tone.
 Now he treads that gloomy track,
 Whence none ever may come back.
 Out upon you, and your power, 15
 Which all fairest things devour,
 Orcus' gloomy shades, that e'er
 Ye took my bird that was so fair!
 Ah, the pity of it! Thou
 Poor bird, thy doing 't is, that now 20
 My loved one's eyes are swollen and red,
 With weeping for her darling dead.

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

¹ The number of the poem in the complete collection.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY
BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Ye knew it then, and all its race,
 And know the pinnacle too, .20
 Which from its earliest rise, to grace
 Thy lofty summit grew ;
 And in the waves that wash thy shores
 Which moisten'd first its sturdy oars.

Thence many vainly raging seas .25
 It bore its master through ;
 Whether from right or left the breeze
 Upon the canvas blew ;
 Or prosperous to its course the gale
 Spread full and square the straining sail. 30

No vows to Ocean's gods it gave,
 For then no storm could shake ;
 When erst from that remotest wave
 It sought this limpid lake : ¹
 But, ah ! those days are fled at length, 35
 And fled with them are speed and strength.

Now old, worn out, and lost to fame,
 In rest that 's justly due,
 It dedicates this shatter'd frame,
 Ye glorious Twins,² to you — 40
 To you, whose often cheering ray
 Beam'd light and safety on its way.

GEORGE LAMB.

¹ Lake Benacus, now the Lago di Garda. The last part of the voyage was up the rivers Po and Mincio.

² The constellation Gemini was supposed to be Castor and Pollux.

TO LESBIA

(V.)

LIVING, Lesbia, we should e'en be loving.
 Sour severity, tongue of eld maligning,
 All be to us a penny's estimation.

Suns set only to rise again to-morrow.
 We, when sets in a little hour the brief light, 5
 Sleep one infinite age, a night for ever.

Thousand kisses, anon to these an hundred,
 Thousand kisses again, another hundred,
 Thousand give me again, another hundred.

Then once heedfully counted all the thousands, 10
 We'll uncount them as idly ; so we shall not Know, nor traitorous eye shall envy,¹ knowing
 All those myriad happy many kisses.

ROBINSON ELLIS.

TO THE SAME

(VII.)

DOST thou, Lesbia, ask that I
 Say how many of thy kisses
 Would my craving satisfy,
 Yes, would surfeit me with blisses ?

¹ Information as to the exact number of blessings of any kind was supposed to enable an enemy to exert an evil influence.

Count the grains of sand besprent
 O'er Cyrene's ¹ spicy plain,
 'Twixt old Battus' ² monument
 And the sweltering Hammon's ³ fane.

Count the silent stars of night,
 That be ever watching, when Lovers tasting stol'n delight
 Dream not of their silent ken. 10

When these numbers thou hast told,
 And hast kisses given as many,
 Then I may, perchance, cry hold! 15
 And no longer wish for any.

But, my love, there's no amount
 For a rage like mine too vast,
 Which a curious fool may count,
 Or with tongue malignant blast. 20

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

TO HIMSELF

ON LESBIA'S INCONSTANCY

(VIII)

AH, poor Catullus, learn to put away
 Thy childish things.
 The lost is lost, be sure; the task essay
 That manhood brings.

¹ A city in Libya.

² The founder of Cyrene.

³ A name under which Jupiter was worshipped in Africa.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

VARUS' MISTRESS

(X.)

VARUS, whom I chanced to meet
 The other evening in the street,
 Engaged me there, upon the spot,
 To see a mistress he had got.
 She seem'd, as far as I can gather,
 Lively and smart, and handsome rather.
 There, as we rested from our walk,
 We enter'd into different talk —
 As, how much might Bithynia bring?
 And had I found it a good thing? 10
 I answer'd, as it was the fact,
 The province had been stript and sack'd;
 That there was nothing for the praetors,
 And still less for us wretched creatures,
 His poor companions and toad-eaters. 15
 “At least,” says she, “you bought some fellows
 To bear your litter; for they tell us,
 Our only good ones come from there.”
 I chose to give myself an air;
 “Why, truly, with my poor estate, 20
 The difference was n't quite so great
 Betwixt a province, good or bad,
 That where a purchase could be had,
 Eight lusty fellows, straight and tall,
 I should n't find the wherewithal 25
 To buy them.” But it was a lie;
 For not a single wretch had I —
 No single cripple fit to bear
 A broken bedstead or a chair.
 She, like a strumpet, pert and knowing, 30

Said — “ Dear Catullus, I am going
To worship at Serapis’¹ shrine —
Do lend me, pray, those slaves of thine ! ”

I answer’d — “ It was idly said, —

They were a purchase Cinna made (Caius Cinna, my good friend) —

35

It was the same thing in the end,

Whether a purchase or a loan —

I always used them as my own ;

Only the phrase was inexact —

40

He bought them for himself, in fact.

But you have caught the general vice

Of being too correct and nice,

Over curious and precise ;

And seizing with precipitation

45

The slight neglects of conversation.”

J. HOOKHAM FRERE.

TO FABULLUS

(XIII.)

You dine with me, Fabullus mine,

On Friday next, at half-past two :

And I can promise that you ’ll dine

As well as man need wish to do ;

If you bring with you, when you come,

A dinner of the very best,

And lots of wine and mirth, and some

Fair girl to give the whole a zest.

But bring all these you must, I vow,

If you ’re to find yourself in clover,

10

¹ An Egyptian divinity, whose cult was fashionable in Catullus’ time.

For your Catullus' purse just now
 With spiders' webs is running over.

But anyhow, a welcome warm
 And loving shall be yours, I ween;
 And, for a rarer, daintier charm, 15
 A perfume which the Paphian queen ¹

Gave to my girl, — so rare, so sweet,
 That, when you smell it, in the throes
 Of ecstasy you 'll straight entreat
 The gods to make you wholly nose. 20

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

TO SIRMIO ²

(XXXI.)

O BEST of all the scattered spots that lie
 In sea or lake — apple of landscape's eye —
 How gladly do I drop within thy nest,
 With what a sigh of full contented rest,
 Scarce able to believe my journey o'er,
 And that these eyes behold thee safe once more.
 Oh, where 's the luxury like the smile at heart,
 When the mind, breathing, lays its load apart —
 When we come home again, tired out, and spread
 The loosened limbs o'er all the wished-for bed; 10
 This, this alone is worth an age of toil!
 Hail lovely Sirmio! Hail paternal soil!
 Joy, my bright waters, joy, your master's come!
 Laugh, every dimple on the cheek of home!

LEIGH HUNT.

¹ Venus.

² A peninsula in the Lago di Garda, where Catullus had a villa.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

And as of old be good to us,
The lineage of Romulus.

R. C. JEBB.

TO CORNIFICIUS

(XXXVIII.)

CORNIFICIUS, ill is your Catullus,
Ill, ah heaven, a weary weight of anguish,
More, more weary with every day, with each hour.

You deny me the least, the very lightest
Help, one whisper of happy thought to cheer me. 5

Nay, I'm sorrowful. You to slight my passion?
Ah! one word, but a tiny word to cheer me,
Sad as ever a tear Simonidean.¹

ROBINSON ELLIS.

ACME AND SEPTIMIUS

(XLV.)

SEPTIMIUS cried, as on his breast
His darling Acme he caressed,
“My Acme, if I love not thee
To madness, ay, distractedly,
And with a love that well I know
With time shall fonder, wilder grow
In Libya may I then, my sweet,
Or India's burning deserts meet

¹ The allusion is to the pathetic quality of the work of Simonides, the Greek lyric poet (556–467 B. C.).

The green-eyed lion's hungry glare,
And none be by to help me there !” 10

As thus he whispered, Love was pleased,
And on the right propitious sneezed.

Then bending gently back her head,
And with that mouth, so rosy-red,
Impressing on his eyes a kiss, 15
His eyes, that drunken were with bliss,
“ Oh, Septimillus, life ! ” cried she,
“ So love our only master be,
As burns in me, thine Acme true,
A fire that thrills my marrow through, 20
Intenser, mightier, more divine,
Than any thou canst feel in thine ! ”

As thus she whispered, Love was pleased,
And on the right propitious sneezed.

Now hallowed by such omens fair, 25
Each dotes on each, that happy pair.
He, sick with love, rates Acme's smiles
Above the East or Britain's isles ;
Whilst Acme, to Septimius true,
For him, him only, doth renew 30
Love's first delights, and to her boy
Unfolds fresh treasuries of joy.

Were ever souls so lapped in bliss !
Was ever love so blest as this !

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

TO LESBIA

(LI.)

HIM rival to the gods I place,
 Him loftier yet, if loftier be,
 Who, Lesbia, sits before thy face,
 Who listens and who looks on thee ;

Thee, smiling soft. Yet this delight
 Doth all my sense consign to death ;
 For when thou dawnest on my sight,
 Ah, wretched ! flits my laboring breath.

My tongue is palsied. Subtly hid
 Fire creeps me through from limb to limb : 10
 My loud ears tingle all unbid :
 Twin clouds of night mine eyes bedim.

Ease is my plague : ease makes thee void,
 Catullus, with these vacant hours,
 And wanton : ease that hath destroyed 15
 Great kings, and states with all their powers.

W. E. GLADSTONE.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

IV.

Hymen, come, for Julia
 Weds with Manlius to-day, 20
 And deigns to be a bride.
 Such a form as Venus wore
 In the contest famed of yore,
 On Mount Ida's side ;¹

V.

Like the myrtle or the bay, 25
 Florid, elegant, and gay,
 With foliage fresh and new ;
 Which the nymphs and forest maids
 Have foster'd in sequester'd shades,
 With drops of holy dew. 30

VI.

Leave, then, all the rocks and cells
 Of the deep Aonian² dells,
 And the caverns hoar ;
 And the dreary streams that weep
 From the stony Thespian steep,³ 35
 Dripping evermore.

VII.

Haste away to new delights,
 To domestic happy rites,
 Human haunts and ways ;
 With a kindly charm applied, 40
 Soften and appease the bride,
 And shorten our delays.

¹ When Paris awarded to her the golden apple.

² Aonia was the name of that part of Boeotia in which Mount Helicon was situated.

³ Mount Helicon, at the foot of which was the city of Thespieae.

VIII.

Bring her hither, bound to move,
 Drawn and led with bands of love,
 Like the tender twine 45
 Which the searching ivy plies,
 Clinging in a thousand ties
 O'er the clasping vine.

IX.

Gentle virgins,¹ you, besides,
 Whom the like event betides, 50
 With the coming year;
 Call on Hymen! call him now!
 Call aloud! A virgin now
 Best befits his ear.

X.

“Is there any deity 55
 More beloved and kind than he —
 More disposed to bless;
 Worthy to be worshipp'd more;
 Master of a richer store
 Of wealth and happiness? 60

XI.

“Youth and age alike agree,
 Serving and adoring thee,
 The source of hope and care;
 Care and hope alike engage
 The wary parent sunk in age 65
 And the restless heir.

¹ A choir of girls had been chosen to sing the hymeneal, which is given in stanzas x.-xvi.

XII.

“ She the maiden, half afraid,
 Hears the new proposal made,
 That proceeds from thee ;
 You resign and hand her over
 To the rash and hardy lover
 With a fix’d decree. 70

XIII.

“ Hymen, Hymen, you preside,
 Maintaining honor and the pride
 Of women free from blame, 75
 With a solemn warrant given,
 Is there any power in heaven
 That can do the same ?

XIV.

“ Love, accompanied by thee,
 Passes unreprieved and free, 80
 But without thee, not :
 Where on earth, or in the sky,
 Can you find a deity
 With a fairer lot ?

XV.

“ Heirship in an honor’d line 85
 Is sacred as a gift of thine,
 But without thee, not :
 Where on earth, or in the sky,
 Can you find a deity
 With a fairer lot ? 90

XVI.

“ Rule and empire — royalty,
 Are rightful as derived from thee,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Fear not that the sun
 Will dawn upon a fairer face, —
 Nor in his airy, lofty race
 Behold a lovelier one.

120

XXI.

Mark and hear us, gentle bride ;
 Behold the torches nimbly plied,
 Waving here and there ;
 Along the street and in the porch,
 See the fiery-tressed torch
 Spreads its sparkling hair.

125

XXII.

Like a lily, fair and chaste,
 Lovely bride, you shall be placed
 In a garden gay,
 A wealthy lord's delight and pride ;
 Come away then, happy bride,
 Hasten, hence away !

130

XXIII.

Mark and hear us — he, your lord,
 Will be true at bed and board,
 Nor ever walk astray,
 Withdrawing from your lovely side ;
 Mark and hear us, gentle bride,
 Hasten, hence away !

135

XXIV.

Like unto the tender vine,
 He shall ever clasp and twine,
 Clinging night and day,

140

Fairly bound and firmly tied ;
 Come away then, happy bride,
 Hasten, hence away !

XXVI.

Make ready. There I see within
 The bride is veil'd ; the guests begin
 To muster close and slow :
 Trooping onward close about,
 Boys, be ready with a shout — 155
 “ Hymen ! Hymen ! Ho ! ”

XXVII.

Now begins the free career,¹ —
 For many a jest and many a jeer,
 And many a merry saw ;
 Customary taunts and gibes, 160
 Such as ancient use prescribes,
 And immemorial law.

XXVIII. ²

“ Some at home, it must be fear'd,
 Will be slighted, and cashier'd,
 Pride will have a fall ; 165
 Now the favorites' reign is o'er,
 Proud enough they were before, —
 Proud and nice withal.

XXIX.

“ Full of pride and full of scorn ;
 Now you see them clipt and shorn, 170

¹ The procession was conducted with the greatest hilarity.

² Stanzas xxviii.—xxxii. seem to have been sung by a choir of boys, who forecast the changes in the bridegroom's household after his marriage.

Humbler in array ;
 Sent away, for fear of harm,
 To the village or the farm, —
 Pack'd in haste away.

XXX.

“Other doings must be done, 175
 Another empire is begun,
 Behold your own domain!
 Gentle bride! Behold it there!
 The lordly palace proud and fair: —
 You shall live and reign 180

XXXI.

“In that rich and noble house,
 Till age shall silver o'er the brows,
 And nod the trembling head,
 Not regarding what is meant,
 Incessant uniform assent 185
 To all that's done or said.

XXXII.

“Let the faithful threshold greet,
 With omens fair, those lovely feet,
 Lightly lifted o'er;¹
 Let the garlands wave and bow 190
 From the lofty lintel's brow
 That bedeck the door.”

XXXIII.

See the couch² with crimson dress —
 Where, seated in the deep recess,

¹ The lifting of the bride over the threshold of her new home was probably a survival of the marriage by capture.

² The bridegroom is represented as reclining at a wedding supper, which had been prepared in anticipation of the coming of the bride.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

XXXIX.

“ Ay, and you yourself in truth
 Are a goodly, comely youth,
 Proper, tall, and fair ;
 Venus and the graces too
 Have befriended each of you
 For a lovely pair.”

230

XLII.

Fear not ! with the coming year,
 The new Torquatus will be here,
 Him we soon shall see
 With infant gesture fondly seek
 To reach his father's manly cheek,
 From the mother's knee.

250

XLIII.

With laughing eyes and dewy lip,
 Pouting like the purple tip
 That points the rose's bud ;
 While mingled with the mother's grace,
 Strangers shall recognize the trace
 That marks the Maulian blood.

255

J. HOOKHAM FRERE.

REMORSE

(LXXVI., vv. 10 seq.)

WHY longer keep thy heart upon the rack ?
 Give to thy soul a higher, nobler aim.
 And tho' thou tear thy heart out, look not back
 In tears upon a love that was thy shame.

'T is hard at once to fling a love away
 That has been cherish'd with the faith of years.
 'T is hard: but shrink not, flinch not. Come what may,
 Crush every record of its joys and fears.

O ye great gods, if ye can pity feel,
 If e'er to dying wretch your aid was given, 10
 See me in agony before you kneel,
 To beg this plague from out my core be driven,

Which creeps in drowsy horror thro' each vein,
 Leaves me no thought from bitter anguish free;
 I do not ask that she be kind again, 15
 Nor pure: for that can never, never be.

I only crave the health that once was mine,
 Some little respite from this sore disease.
 If e'er I earned your mercy, powers divine,
 Grant me — O grant to a sick heart some ease! 20

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.
 R. Y. TYRRELL.

LOVE AND HATE

(LXXXV.)

I LOVE and hate. Ah! never ask why so!
 I hate and love — and that is all I know.
 I see 't is folly, but I feel 't is woe.

W. S. LANDOR.

AT HIS BROTHER'S GRAVE¹

(CL.)

O'ER many a sea, o'er many a stranger land,
 I bring this tribute² to thy lonely tomb,
 My brother! and beside the narrow room
 That holds thy silent ashes weeping stand.
 Vainly I call to thee. Who can command
 An answer forth from Orcus' dreary gloom?
 Oh, brother, brother, life lost all its bloom,
 When thou wert snatched from me with pitiless hand!

Woe, woe is me, that we shall meet no more!
 Meanwhile, these gifts accept, which to the grave¹⁰
 Of those they loved in life our sires of yore
 With pious hand and reverential gave —
 Gifts that are streaming with a brother's tears!
 And now, farewell, and rest thee from all fears!

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

¹ Catullus' brother died in the Troad, and was buried there.

² Offerings of wine, milk, and flowers.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

tor urbanus, in 63 consul. The year of his consulship was marked by the conspiracy of Catiline. Successful in bringing about the execution of some of the most notorious of the conspirators, he was himself subsequently driven into exile through the machinations of enemies, who revived a law according to which any one who ordered the execution of a Roman citizen before he had been condemned by the people, was guilty of treason. He had been in banishment some ten months when in August, 57, he was recalled by a vote of the comitia centuriata. From 51 to 50 he was proconsul of Cilicia. Meanwhile the struggle between Caesar and Pompey had come to a crisis. After long hesitation Cicero declared for Pompey and followed him to Dyrrachium. When the supremacy of the Caesarians was established, he retired from political life and devoted himself to literature. After Caesar's assassination he emerged once more as an opponent of Mark Antony. This was the immediate cause of his fall. He was proscribed by the second triumvirate, and killed by their emissaries on the 7th of December, 43.

“Most eloquent of all the descendants of Romulus, as many as are, or have been, or ever shall be,” — such is the characterization of Cicero by Catullus, and subsequent ages have indorsed his opinion. Some of his speeches are, it is true, open to criticism, if judged by the standard of a modern law court. He does not always confine himself strictly to the points of law involved, or to the facts of the case in hand. For example, in the Pro Archia, the panegyric of literature has a much more conspicuous place than the legality of the defendant's citizenship. There is, too, another criticism that is often and perhaps justly made, namely, that even the most impassioned of his utterances on state questions show a lack of that moral earnestness which is so prominent a feature of the orations of Demosthenes. Yet even with these shortcomings, Cicero's orations are masterpieces of eloquence; and his vivid imagination, that finds play in descriptions of persons, places, and actions, in similes and metaphors of almost infinite number and variety, his extraordinary keenness, which enabled him to single out swiftly and effectively the weak points in an adversary's position, his wide range of information, his marvellous command of language, and his powers of invective make a combination of qualities difficult to parallel in the whole history of oratory.

His rhetorical writings have special value as the productions of one who, besides being conspicuously successful in the practice of oratory, had made a long and careful study of the methods and standards of the different schools.

It was during years of enforced retirement that most of his philosophical works were written. They are, in the main, a working over of Greek material, especially the treatises of the post-Aristotelian philosophers, and offer very little that is new or original. Apart from their literary merit, their most important function, both in his own and in subsequent ages, was in serving as a medium for the popularization of Greek philosophy. They are, for the most part, cast in the form of dialogues, and deal with such questions as Government, Law, the Theory of Knowledge, the Greatest Good and the Greatest Evil, the Nature of the Gods, and more practical problems of ethics, as in the treatise on Moral Duties addressed to his son Marcus. Among the most charming are the two short pieces on Old Age, in which we have a masterly characterization of Cato Major, and on Friendship, in which Laelius is the principal interlocutor.

Of greater interest are the letters, of which we have sixteen books addressed to his intimate friend Atticus, sixteen to other friends and members of his household, three to his brother Quintus, and one to Brutus. These furnish us with a large mass of material for the study of colloquial Latin, and are, in addition, of inestimable value for the light they throw upon the political history of the time, and upon Cicero's character and private life.

THE SPEECH FOR CLUENTIUS ¹

(The second division of the case, from section 164 to the end.)

THERE you have, gentlemen,² all that his accusers have succeeded in raking together for the whole case, after eight years' preparation, concerning the character of A. Cluentius, against whom, on his trial, they would fain stir up ill-feeling. How trivial are the allegations in themselves, how groundless in fact, how short to answer! Listen now to what concerns the oath you have sworn, to what belongs to your court, to what the statute of poisoning,³ in obedience to whose summons you are here assembled, has imposed on you as an obligation. I should like to know how brief the statement of this case could have been made, and how much that I have said was spoken in deference to my client's wishes, but did not in any way concern your court.

It was alleged by the prosecution that A. Cluentius made away with Vibius Capax⁴ by poison. There is ¹ The trial took place in 66 B. C. The defendant, Aulus Cluentius Habitus, was accused of having poisoned or caused to be poisoned (1) Vibius Capax, (2) Balbutius, (3) Oppianicus, his step-father. The last was the principal count of the accusation. The prosecution was instituted by Oppianicus' son, but the real instigator of the action was Sassia, the wife of the alleged victim, and the mother of the defendant. Eight years before, Oppianicus, brought to trial by Cluentius on a charge of attempting to poison him, had been convicted, and banished from the city. He died in exile, apparently in consequence of a fall from his horse, but according to Sassia, from poison administered by an agent of Cluentius. In the first part of the speech Cicero tries to remove the prejudice that existed against his client as a result of the feeling that he had had some part in the wholesale bribery of the jurors at the trial of Oppianicus in 74. In the second part he deals with the specific charges of poisoning.

² Of the jury.

³ The fifth chapter of the Lex Cornelia de Sicariis et Veneficis.

⁴ Not otherwise known.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

to have a fresh charge added on to it? What kind of a time was that to choose for administering poison, on such a day and before such a number of people? By whom, moreover, was it offered? Where was it procured? What about the stoppage of the cup? And why was it not offered afresh? There is much that might be said; but I shall not lay myself open to the charge of wishing to say something while saying nothing. The facts are their own defence. I assert that the youth spoken of, who, according to you, expired immediately after draining the cup, did not die on that day at all. It is a monstrous accusation and a shameless falsehood. I say that when he came to the breakfast he was suffering from indigestion; he indulged his appetites too freely at the time, as young men like him will do; and he died in consequence after a few days' illness. Who will vouch for this? The same man who will vouch for his own sorrow — his father — the young man's father, I repeat. He who for his grief of heart could have been induced by a very faint suspicion to come forward on the other side as a witness against A. Cluentius, gives him the support of his testimony instead. Read it. And do you, sir,¹ if you please, stand up for a little, and endure the pang of this indispensable allusion; on which I shall not linger any longer, since by acting like the excellent man you are, you have not permitted your sorrow to involve the guiltless in the calamity of a baseless accusation.

I have still one similar charge remaining, gentlemen, which will enable you thoroughly to appreciate the truth of what I said in the beginning of my speech — that whatever misfortune A. Cluentius has seen during these past years, whatever anxiety and trouble he has had at this time, has been entirely due to the machinations of his mother. You allege that Oppianicus¹ lost his life by poison given him in a piece of bread by one M. Asellius, an intimate friend of his, who acted, you say, at the instigation of Habitus. Now I have first to ask what motive Habitus had for wishing to take the life of Oppianicus? I admit, indeed, that they had been at enmity. But it is either from feelings of fear or of hatred that men desire the death of their enemies; and what fear, I ask, could have prompted Habitus to seek to perpetrate such a monstrous crime? Was there any reason why any one should be afraid of Oppianicus now that he had been punished for his crimes and banished the country? What had he to fear? The attack of a ruined man? Impeachment by a felon? Harm from the evidence of an outlaw? If again it was because he hated his enemy that Habitus desired his death, was he such a fool as to think that the life which Oppianicus was then living — condemned, an outlaw, forsaken by all — was worthy of the name, when, owing to the monstrosity of his character, no one would receive him into his house, no one would go near him, no one would speak to him, no one would look at him? And was it to this man that Habitus grudged his life? If he hated him bitterly and with all his heart, ought he not to have wished him to live as long as possible? Was his enemy to hasten his death — death that in his troubles was for him the only refuge from misfortune? Why, had he possessed a spark of spirit or courage, he would have died by his own hand, as many brave men in like afflictions have done before him ; and wherefore should his enemy have wished to put in his way what he ought to have desired for himself? As it is, I wonder what evil death has brought him ! Unless indeed, carried away by idle tales, we imagine that he is suffering in the nether world the punishment of the wicked, and that he has fallen in with more enemies there than he left behind him here ; that by the avenging furies of his mother-in-law,¹ of his wives, of his brother, and of his children, he has been driven headlong into the place where the ungodly have their home. If, however, these representations are untrue, as all must know they are, what, I ask, has death taken away from him save the sensation of misery ?

¹ Balbutius' father.

¹ Cicero now comes to the principal charge against his client, the alleged poisoning of his stepfather, Oppianicus.

But again, by whom was the poison administered ? By M. Asellius. What connection had he with Habitus ? None ; in fact, as he was very intimate with Oppianicus, he was more probably even on bad terms with him. Did he then choose the person who, as he knew, was anything but friendly to himself, and who was an intimate acquaintance of his intended victim, to be the instrument of his own crime and of the jeopardy of his foe ? Then why do you,² whom filial piety has prompted to undertake this prosecution, suffer this Asellius to go so long unpunished ? Why have you not followed the example of Habitus, and so secured, by the conviction of the man who proffered the poison, a previous verdict prejudicing my client ? Again how incredible it is, gentlemen, that poison should have been administered in a piece of bread ! how unusual ! how strange ! Could it diffuse its effects more readily

¹ Oppianicus was said to have poisoned her as well as many others of his relatives

² Oppianicus' son

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

conduct of the Falernian yeoman, he set out for Rome, where he used to have some hired lodgings outside the city gates ; but falling from his horse, he is said to have struck his side violently, in bad health as he was, and to have died a few days after reaching the city in a fever. Such, gentlemen, are the circumstances of his death. Either they involve no suspicion at all, or, if they do, it hangs upon some domestic tragedy comprised within the four walls of his house.

On his decease that abominable woman began at once to plot against her son. She resolved to hold an inquest on her husband's death. Having bought from A. Rupilius, who had been the medical attendant of Oppianicus, one Strato, — as if forsooth she entertained the same design as Habitus when he bought Diogenes,¹ — she gave out that she intended to examine Strato by torture, as well as Ascla, one of her own slaves ; and she further called on young Oppianicus to give up for like examination the slave Nicostratus, whom she suspected of having been too communicative in his excessive fidelity to his master. At that time Oppianicus was but a boy ; and being told that it was about his father's death that the inquest was to be held, he did not dare refuse, though he believed the slave had been well disposed to his father and was so also to himself. The friends and guest-friends of Oppianicus and of the woman herself are called together in large numbers, men of reputation and of every kind of distinction ; and in the rigid inquiry which ensues all sorts of instruments of torture are brought into requisition. The slaves were wrought on both by hope and by fear to make them say something on the rack ; but

¹ The slave of Cluentius' physician, whose coöperation Oppianicus' agent had tried to procure in attempting Cluentius' life.

I suppose it was the high character of the spectators, and the intensity of the torture that led them to hold by the truth and to protest that they had nothing to tell. So by the advice of the friends the inquiry was adjourned for that day. After a considerable interval they are summoned a second time ; the examination is begun over again, and all the most powerful and agonizing tortures are applied. Unable to stand it any longer, the witnesses expostulate. The bloodthirsty and unnatural woman is beside herself with rage at the utter disappointment of her designs ; and though now the torturer and his very instruments were wearied out, she refused to desist. Then one of the spectators, a man whom his country had honored with high office, and who was personally of the most exalted worth, remarked that he saw her object was not to find out the truth, but to force them to make some false deposition. With this the rest agreed, and so it was unanimously resolved that, in their opinion, the inquiry had gone on long enough. Nicostratus is given back to Oppianicus, and Sassia herself departs with her people for Larinum, grieved at the thought that her son would now surely be beyond the reach of danger. Not even the fictions of suspicion, she reflected, far less a regular accusation, could touch him ; and not even his mother's secret plottings, to say nothing of the open attack of his enemies, had been able to do him harm. On her arrival at Larinum, she who had pretended that she was fully convinced that Strato had in time past administered poison to her husband, forthwith made him a present of a shop in the town, equipped and fitted up for the practice of medicine.

For one, two, three years Sassia kept quiet ; it seemed as if she were praying and desiring that some disaster might come upon her son, rather than planning and contriving it. In the interval, during the consulship of Q. Hortensius and Q. Metellus, designing to draw him on to this prosecution, though his attention was otherwise occupied and nothing was further from his thoughts, she betrothed to Oppianicus here, against his will, the daughter whom she had borne to her son-in-law,¹ in the hope that these matrimonial bonds, as well as the fetters of an expectant heir, would put him in her power. About this very time Doctor Strato committed a domestic theft, aggravated by murder, under the following circumstances. There was in the house a cabinet which he knew contained a considerable sum in gold and silver. So by night he killed two of his fellow-slaves in their sleep, and flung them into the fishpond; and then, cutting out the bottom of the box with his own hands, he removed 150,000 sesterces² and five pounds' weight of the gold, one of the slaves, a mere boy, being privy to the deed. Next day the theft was discovered, and suspicion was directed exclusively against the slaves who were missing. But on noticing that the bottom of the box had been cut out, men began to ask by what means it could have been done; and one of Sassia's friends recollected that he had lately seen for sale at an auction, among other small effects, a bent crooked little saw, with teeth all over it, by which he thought the part removed could have been cut out. To be brief, on inquiry being made of the collectors,³ it is discovered that the saw in question had found its way into the hands of Strato. This

¹ Sassia had induced A. Aurius Melinus, her daughter's husband, to put away his wife, and marry her.

² About $6000

³ Those who collected the money from purchasers at public auctions.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Rutilius, P. Satrius, and the other honorable men, that the thing had evidently gone on long enough — can it be, I ask, that three years afterward, without inviting the presence, I shall not say of any man, or you might perhaps retort that the yeoman was in attendance, but of any respectable man, you attempted, about the same matter and on the same persons, to hold an inquiry that involved capital consequences to your son? Or do you say (for a possible argument occurs to me though you must remember that it has not yet been put forward) that it was when investigation was being made into the theft that Strato made a confession about the poison? In this very way, gentlemen, does it happen that truth raises her head out of the depths to which depravity oftentimes weighs her down, and the defence of innocence that has been stifled breathes again. Either cunning rogues have no daring in proportion to their invention, or they whose audacity is conspicuous and prominent have no knavish arts by which to back it. But if craft were daring or audacity cunning, resistance would be hardly possible. Was the theft not committed? Why, nothing was more notorious at Larinum. Then did suspicion not attach to Strato? Why, the saw was his accuser, and the boy who had been his accomplice informed on him. Was this not the object of the inquiry? What other ground, then, was there for holding it? Will you not have to say what Sassia said more than once at the time — that when investigation was being made about the theft Strato while on the rack made a statement about the poison? Here we have an instance of what I said above: the woman has audacity enough and to spare, but is wanting in prudence and tact. Several minutes of the depositions made at the inquiry are brought forward ; they have been read aloud and communicated to you, and they are the very minutes which she said were attested by the signature of the witnesses at the inquiry. But in them not a syllable about the theft is to be found. It never occurred to her first to write out Strato's deposition about the theft, and afterwards to tack on some statement about the poison which might seem not to have been elicited by direct questioning, but to have been wrung from him in his agony. The subject of the inquiry is the theft. The suspicion of poisoning had been done away with by the previous inquiry, as, indeed, the woman herself had admitted ; for after deciding at Rome, on the representation of her friends, that it had gone far enough, she had during the three years that followed shown a fondness for this Strato above all her slaves, holding him in high esteem, and conferring on him every mark of favor. Well, then, the inquiry was being made about the theft — the theft, namely, which beyond all dispute he had committed — did he without saying a word upon the subject of that inquiry make a statement at once about the poison ? If he did not speak of the theft when one might have expected him to do so, did he never, even at the end, or in the middle, or at least in some part or other of the inquiry, say a single word about it ?

You see now, gentlemen, that with the same hand with which, if opportunity were given her, she would gladly slay her son, this abominable woman has forged her account of the inquiry. And even with regard to it, can you mention the name of any single individual who witnessed it with his hand and seal ? You will find no one, except perhaps a person ¹ whose character is such that I should prefer his being brought forward to no name being mentioned at all. What say you, T. Accius?¹ Are you actually bringing before a court a capital charge, a criminal information, a written instrument involving the fortunes of another, without giving the name of any voucher for that instrument, of any one who sealed it, of any one who witnessed its signature? And will this honorable court admit the weapon which you have drawn forth from a mother's bosom for the ruin of a most guiltless son? But enough; the document has no weight. As to the inquiry itself, however, why was it not reserved for the court? why not for the friends and guest-friends of Oppianicus, whom she had invited to be present on the former occasion? why not at least for the existing conjuncture? What was done with these men? I ask you, Oppianicus, to say what happened to your slave, Nicostratus. You were shortly about to impeach my client, and you ought therefore to have brought him to Rome, allowed him to give information, aye, and preserved him in safety for examination, for this court, and for this occasion. As to Strato, gentlemen, I have to inform you that he was crucified after having had his tongue cut out, as is known to every one at Larinum. It was not her own evil conscience that the distraught woman feared, it was not the detestation of the townsmen, it was not the public scandal. Just as if every one were not to be a witness to her crime, what she dreaded was lest the dying words of a slave should testify against her.

¹ The Falernian yeoman, Sassia's paramour.

Gracious Heaven! what a prodigy have we in this woman! Where in the whole world can we point to ¹ He was conducting the prosecution.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

anicus contrived nothing apart from the woman's coöperation. Had he acted alone, she would surely have left him after the detection of his design, and left him not as one separating herself from a wicked husband, but as fleeing from a most ruthless foe ; she would surely have turned her back for all time upon a house that was a very sink of iniquity. But so far was she from doing this that from that time forth she lost no opportunity of hatching some plot or other, devoting all her powers of thought every day and every night to the destruction of the son of her bosom. And first, by way of nerving Oppianicus there for the prosecution of her son, she bound him to herself by gifts and presents, bestowing on him her daughter's hand in marriage, and holding out the hope of succession to her estate.

Thus whereas in most cases, when unaccustomed enmity has sprung up among kinsmen, we see divorces and the severing of relationships ensue, this woman thought that no one would be strong enough for the prosecution of her son except one who had previously taken his sister¹ to wife. New relationships often lead others to lay aside long-standing animosities ; she thought that in the bond of relationship she would have a pledge that would give a backbone to her feud. Nor did she bestow all her pains on securing a prosecutor for her son ; she also pondered with what weapons she could furnish him. To this end it was, that by means of threats and promises alike she worked upon the slaves ; to this end did she hold those everlasting and more barbarous inquests on the death of Oppianicus, which were at last brought to a close not by any moderation on her part, but by the influence of her friends. In the same inquiry originated the inquiries held three years afterward at Larinum; in the same distraction of mind the forgery of the depositions there made; in the same frenzy also the execrable amputation of Strato's tongue. She it was, in short, who found and got ready all the materials of this elaborate indictment. And after dispatching thus equipped to Rome a prosecutor for her son, she herself tarried awhile at Larinum in order to seek out and hire witnesses; but on being informed of the near approach of the defendant's trial, she hastened hither with all speed, for fear that the prosecution might fail in diligence, or else that the witnesses might want money, or that she might perchance miss seeing this man's garb of mourning,¹ and his unkempt appearance, a spectacle so dear to her mother's heart.

¹ Auria, Cluentius' half-sister.

But what, think you, were the circumstances which attended her journey to the capital? I live in the neighborhood of Aquinum and Fabrateria,² and from many citizens I have heard and ascertained the facts. What crowds ran together in these towns! What loud groans were uttered alike by the men and by the women! The idea of a lady of Larinum actually setting out for Rome from the very shores of the Adriatic, with a crowd of attendants and a store of money, in order to be able more readily to compass in a capital trial the ruin and destruction of her son! There was, I might almost say, not a man among them but thought that every spot on which she had set her foot would require to be freed from pollution; not a man but thought that the footprints of that crime-stained mother were a profanation to the earth, the mother of all. So in no town was she permitted to make a halt. Inns were there in abundance, but nowhere was there found a host who did not shun the contagion of her presence. She preferred to intrust herself to the solitude of night rather than to any city or hostelry. And thinks she now that any one of us are unaware of her schemes, her intrigues, her daily stratagems? Full well we know those whom she has approached, to whom she has promised money, whose honesty she has attempted to shake by proffers of reward; aye, and we have heard of her nightly sacrifices, which she imagines are a secret, of her impious prayers and her abominable vows, by which she makes the very gods in heaven witnesses to her crime; not knowing that it is piety, and holy fear, and the prayers of the righteous that avail to turn their hearts, not the defilements of superstition, nor the blood of victims sacrificed for the furtherance of crime. Her unnatural frenzy I am confident the immortal gods have spurned from their altars and their shrines.

¹ Accused persons wore a dark-colored toga.

² Towns in Latium, not far from Arpinum, Cicero's birthplace.

Do you, gentlemen, whom fortune has appointed to play the part of another Providence to A. Cluentius here for all the rest of his life, ward off from the person of her son the monstrous inhumanity of this mother. Men have often on the bench pardoned the offences of children out of compassion for their parents; do not you, we pray you, sacrifice to his mother's unnatural cruelty the life this man has most virtuously led, especially as you may see a whole township arrayed in evidence against her. You must know, gentlemen, that all the men of Larinum — incredible though it is, I say it in all truth — all who were able made the journey to Rome, to give my client, so far as in them lay, the support of their sympathy and numbers in

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

rucini¹ no less distinguished than they ; from Teanum Apulum² and from Luceria² you see honorable Roman knights come to speak his praise ; from Bovianum and from the length and breadth of Samnium most flattering panegyrics have been forwarded, and men of the highest consideration and renown have also come in person. And as to those who have property, business avocations, or grazing stock in the territory of Larinum, honorable men of the highest distinction, it were hard to speak of their solicitude and anxiety. Few, I think, are loved by one as this man is by them all. How sorry I am that L. Volusienus, a man of the greatest distinction and worth, is not present at this trial ! Would that P. Helvidius Rufus, an eminently illustrious Roman knight, could be here when I speak his name ! Sleepless day and night in my client's interests, while he was instructing me in the case he fell seriously and dangerously ill ; and yet even in his illness he is as anxious about the defendant's safety as about his own recovery. His evidence and eulogy will make you aware of no less enthusiasm on the part of that excellent and honorable senator Cn. Tudicus. Of you, P. Volumnius, I speak in the same expectation but with greater reserve, inasmuch as you are on the jury in this case. To be brief, the whole neighborhood, I tell you, cherishes the greatest goodwill towards the defendant. Their unanimous enthusiasm, solicitude, and painstaking care ; my exertions — and I have pleaded this case from beginning to end single-handed, as I have long been wont to do ; and also the justice and clemency of this court, are combated by one woman, the defendant's mother. And what kind of mother? You see how she is carried along in all the blindness of cruelty and crime. No depths of dishonor have ever proved a hindrance to her lust. In the depravity of her mind she has overturned in the foulest manner all the binding ordinances of society, too infatuated to be called a human being, too outrageous for the name of woman, too unnatural for that of mother. Aye, and she has ever confounded the designations of kinship as well as the name and ordinances of nature. Her son-in-law's wife, a step-mother to her son, the mistress of her daughter's husband, she has, in a word, sunk so low as to have nothing left her in the likeness of man except her external form.

¹ Their territory extended along the right bank of the river Atermus to the Adriatic Sea.

² In Apulia.

Now by your hate of crime, gentlemen, debar a mother from access to the life-blood of her son. Inflict on her who gave him birth the pang, incredible as it is, of seeing the deliverance and triumph of her offspring; suffer the mother to depart vanquished by your justice, and so deprive her of the joy of being bereft of her child. And again, by that love which, if true to your nature, you have for honor, truth, and virtue, raise at length from the ground the suppliant now before you, after so many years of groundless prejudice and peril. Now for the first time since the avaricious conduct of others fanned that prejudice into flame has he begun to take heart, and in reliance on your impartiality in some degree to breathe again, forgetting fear. His all is in your hands; many there are who desire his deliverance, but you alone are able to secure it. Habitus entreats you, gentlemen, and beseeches you with tears not to sacrifice him to the prejudice which in courts of law ought to be of no avail; not to the mother whose vows and prayers you must put far from your minds ; not to the execrable Oppianicus, a convicted criminal now in his grave. But if at this trial the stroke of some disaster lay my guiltless client low, then will he verily in his wretchedness — if indeed he continue to live, which it will be hard for him to do — often bitterly lament that the poison of Fabricus was ever detected. For had it not been exposed at the time it would have been to this most miserable man, not poison, but the antidote of his many sorrows ; aye, and his mother might perchance have followed in his funeral procession, counterfeiting grief for the death of her son. But as it is what good will have been done, save that it will seem as if his life were preserved only for affliction out of the midst of deathful snares — only that in death he might be robbed of the sepulchre of his fathers ? Long enough has he been in trouble, gentlemen ; years enough has he suffered from prejudice. None save her who gave him birth was ever so bitter against him but that we may believe his vengeance is now fully satisfied. [Do you who are just towards all men, who tenderly sustain all those that are cruelly assailed, preserve A. Cluentius. Restore him to his townsmen unharmed ; give him back to the friends, the neighbors, the guest-friends of whose zeal for him you are witnesses ; lay him under an eternal obligation to yourselves and your children. To you, gentlemen, this appertains, to your dignity, your clemency ; with justice do we require you to deliver at last from his distresses a most worthy and altogether guiltless man, and one who to very many people is most beloved and dear. Thus will you give all men to know that, while prejudice may find a place in public meetings, truth reigns supreme in courts of law.]

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

What sweeter joy than in the kindred soul,
Whose converse differs not from self-communion ? ”

How could you have full enjoyment of prosperity, unless with one whose pleasure in it was equal to your own? Nor would it be easy to bear adversity, unless with the sympathy of one on whom it rested more heavily than on your own soul. Then, too, other objects of desire are, in general, adapted, each to some specific purpose, — wealth, that you may use it; power, that you may receive the homage of those around you; posts of honor, that you may obtain reputation; sensual gratification, that you may live in pleasure; health, that you may be free from pain, and may have full exercise of your bodily powers and faculties. But friendship combines the largest number of utilities. Wherever you turn, it is at hand. No place shuts it out. It is never unseasonable, never annoying. Thus, as the proverb says, “ You cannot put water or fire to more uses than friendship serves.” I am not now speaking of the common and moderate type of friendship, which yet yields both pleasure and profit, but of true and perfect friendship, like that which existed in the few instances that are held in special remembrance. Such friendship at once enhances the lustre of prosperity, and by dividing and sharing adversity lessens its burden.

Moreover, while friendship comprises the greatest number and variety of beneficent offices, it certainly has this special prerogative, that it lights up a good hope for the time to come, and thus preserves the minds that it sustains from imbecility or prostration in misfortune. For he, indeed, who looks into the face of a friend beholds, as it were, a copy of himself. Thus the absent are present, and the poor are rich, and the weak are strong, and — what seems stranger still — the dead are alive, such is the honor, the enduring remembrance, the longing love, with which the dying are followed by the living ; so that the death of the dying seems happy, the life of the living full of praise. But if from the condition of human life you were to exclude all kindly union, no house, no city, could stand, nor, indeed, could the tillage of the field survive. If it is not perfectly understood what virtue there is in friendship and concord, it may be learned from dissension and discord. For what house is so stable, what state so firm, that it cannot be utterly overturned by hatred and strife ? Hence it may be ascertained how much good there is in friendship. It is said that a certain philosopher¹ of Agrigentum sang in Greek verse that it is friendship that draws together and discord that parts all things which subsist in harmony, and which have their various movements in nature and in the whole universe. The worth and power of friendship, too, all mortals understand, and attest by their approval in actual instances. Thus, if there comes into conspicuous notice an occasion on which a friend incurs or shares the perils of his friend, who can fail to extol the deed with the highest praise ? What shouts filled the whole theatre at the performance of the new play of my guest and friend Marcus Pacuvius, when — the king not knowing which of the two was Orestes² — Pylades said that he was Orestes, while Orestes persisted in asserting that he was, as in fact he was, Orestes ! The whole assembly rose in applause at this mere fictitious representation. What may we suppose that they would have done, had the same thing occurred in real life? In that case Nature herself displayed her power, when men recognized that as rightly done by another, which they would not have had the courage to do themselves. Thus far, to the utmost of my ability, as it seems to me, I have given you my sentiments concerning friendship. If there is more to be said, as I think that there is, endeavor to obtain it, if you see fit, of those who are wont to discuss such subjects.

¹ Empedocles, born about 485 B. C.

² The friendship of Orestes and Pylades was proverbial. On this occasion each insisted that he should be the one to suffer. The king referred to is Thoas, of the Tauric Chersonesus.

Fannius. But we would rather have it from you. Although I have often consulted those philosophers also, and have listened to them not unwillingly, yet the thread of your discourse differs somewhat from that of theirs.

Scaevola. You would say so all the more, Fannius, had you been present in Scipio's garden at that discussion about the republic, and heard what an advocate of justice he showed himself in answer to the elaborate speech of Philus.

Fannius. It was indeed easy for the man preëminently just to defend justice.

Scaevola. As to friendship, then, is not its defence easy for him who has won the highest celebrity¹ on the ground of friendship maintained with preëminent faithfulness, consistency, and probity?

Laelius. This is, indeed, the employing of force; for what matters the way in which you compel me? You at any rate do compel me; for it is both hard and unfair not to comply with the wishes of one's sons-in-law, especially in a case that merits favorable consideration.

¹ He refers to the great friendship of Laelius and Scipio.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

is nothing more lovable than virtue, — nothing which more surely wins affectionate regard, insomuch that on the score of virtue and probity we love even those whom we have never seen. Who is there that does not recall the memory of Caius Fabricius, of Manius Curins, of Tiberius Coruncanius, whom he never saw, with some good measure of kindly feeling? On the other hand, who is there that can fail to hate Tarquinius Superbus, Spurius Cassius, Spurius Maelius? Our dominion in Italy was at stake in wars under two commanders, Pyrrhus and Hannibal. On account of the good faith of the one,¹ we hold him in no unfriendly remembrance; the other because of his cruelty our people must always hate.

But if good faith has such attractive power that we love it in those whom we have never seen, or — what means still more — in an enemy, what wonder is it if the minds of men are moved to affection when they behold the virtue and goodness of those with whom they can become intimately united?

Love is, indeed, strengthened by favors received, by witnessing assiduity in one's service, and by habitual intercourse; and when these are added to the first impulse of the mind toward love, there flames forth a marvellously rich glow of affectionate feeling. If there are any who think that this proceeds from conscious weakness and the desire to have some person through whom one can obtain what he lacks, they assign, indeed, to friendship a mean and utterly ignoble origin, born, as they would have it, of poverty and neediness. If this were true, then the less of resource one was conscious of having in himself, the better fitted would he be for friendship. The contrary is the case ; for the more confidence a man has in himself, and the more thoroughly he is fortified by virtue and wisdom, so that he is in need of no one, and regards all that concerns him as in his own keeping, the more noteworthy is he for the friendships which he seeks and cherishes. What? Did Africanus¹ need me? Not in the least, by Hercules. As little did I need him. But I was drawn to him by admiration of his virtue, while he, in turn, loved me, perhaps, from some favorable estimate of my character ; and intimacy increased our mutual affection. But though utilities many and great resulted from our friendship, the cause of our mutual love did not proceed from the hope of what it might bring. For as we are beneficent and generous, not in order to exact kindnesses in return (for we do not put our kind offices to interest), but are by nature inclined to be generous, so, in my opinion, friendship is not to be sought for its wages, but because its revenue consists entirely in the love which it implies. Those, however, who, after the manner of beasts, refer everything to pleasure, think very differently. Nor is it wonderful that they do ; for men who have degraded all their thoughts to so mean and contemptible an end can rise to the contemplation of nothing lofty, nothing magnificent and divine. We may, therefore, leave them out of this discussion. But let us have it well understood that the feeling of love and the endearments of mutual affection spring from nature, in case there is a well-established assurance of moral worth in the person thus loved. Those who desire to become friends approach each other, and enter into relation with each other, that each may enjoy the society and the character of him whom he has begun to love ; and they are equal in love, and on either side are more inclined to bestow obligations than to claim a return, so that in this matter there is an honorable rivalry between them. Thus will the greatest benefits be derived from friendship, and it will have a more solid and genuine foundation as tracing its origin to nature than if it proceeded from human weakness. For if it were utility that cemented friendships, an altered aspect of utility would dissolve them. But because nature cannot be changed, therefore true friendships are eternal. This may suffice for the origin of friendship, unless you have, perchance, some objection to what I have said.

¹ Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, who invaded Italy in 280 B. C.

¹ Scipio.

ANDREW P. PEABODY.

LETTERS ¹

TO CN. POMPEIUS MAGNUS, IN ASIA

(Fam. V., 7.) ²

ROME, B. C. 62.

M. TULLIUS CICERO, son of Marcus, greets Cn. Pompeius, son of Cneius, Imperator.

If you and the army are well I shall be glad. From your official dispatch I have, in common with every one else, received the liveliest satisfaction ; for you

¹ In the Letters Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh's translation has been used, except in the case of Fam. XIV., 2, where Mr. G. E. Jeans's version has been given. The chronological order has been followed.

² This letter, one of the collection Ad Familiares, was written shortly after Pompey's dispatches, containing the news of his victory over Mithridates, had been received at Rome.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

and spirit, that you will not be ashamed of being coupled with me in politics as well as in private friendship.

TO HIS WIFE AND FAMILY IN ROME¹

(Fam. XIV., 2)

THESSALONICA, B. C. 58.

I SEND this, my dear Terentia, with much love to you, and my little Tullia, and my Marcus.

I hope you will never think that I write longer letters to other people, unless it so happens that any one has written to me about a number of matters that seem to require an answer. In fact, I have nothing to say, nor is there anything just now that I find more difficult. But to you and my dear little girl I cannot write without shedding many tears, when I picture to myself, as plunged in the deepest affliction, you whom my dearest wish has been to see perfectly happy; and this I ought to have secured for you; yes, and I would have secured, but for our being all so faint-hearted.

I am most grateful to our friend Piso² for his kind services. I did my best to urge that he would not forget you when I was writing to him; and have now thanked him as in duty bound. I gather that you think there is hope of the new tribunes; that will be a safe thing to depend on, if we may on the profession of Pompeius, but I have my fears of Crassus. It is true I see that everything on your part is done both bravely and lovingly, nor does that surprise me, but what pains me is that it should be my fate to expose you to such severe suffering to relieve my own. For Publius Vale-rius, who has been most attentive, wrote me word, and it cost me many tears in the reading, how you had been forced to go from the temple of Vesta to the Valerian office.¹ Alas, my light, my love, whom all used once to look up to for relief! — that you, my Terentia, should be treated thus; that you should be thus plunged in tears and misery, and all through my fault! I have indeed preserved others, only for me and mine to perish.

¹ Written during his exile.

² Tullia's husband.

As to what you say about our house² — or rather its site — I for my part shall consider my restoration to be complete only when I find that it has been restored to me. But these things are not in our hands: what troubles me is, that in the outlay which must be incurred you, unhappy and impoverished as you are, must necessarily share. However, if we succeed in our object, I shall recover everything; but then, if ill-fortune continues to persecute us, are you, my poor dear, to be allowed to throw away what you may have saved from the wreck? As to my expenses, I entreat you, my dearest life, to let other people, who can do so perfectly if they will, relieve you; and be sure as you love me not to let your anxiety injure your health, which you know is so delicate.³ Night and day you are always before my eyes! I can see you making every exertion on my behalf, and I fear you may not be able to bear it. But I know well that all our hopes are in you; so be very careful of your health, that we may be successful in what you hope and are working for.

¹ Terentia's half-sister Fabia was a Vestal, and it is possible that she had taken refuge with her. The "Valerian office" was probably a bank, where she was required to make a declaration about her husband's property.

² His house on the Palatine had been destroyed and a temple of Liberty built on its site.

³ Terentia is said to have lived to the age of 103.

As far as I know there is nobody I ought to write to except those who write to me, or these whom you mention in your letters. Since you prefer it I will not move any further from here, but I hope you will write to me as often as possible, especially if we have any surer grounds for hoping. Good bye, my darlings, good bye.

TO ATTICUS IN ITALY, ON HIS JOURNEY TO ROME

(Att. IV., 4 b.)

ANTIUM,¹ B. C. 56.

IT will be delightful if you come to see us here. You will find that Tyrannio² has made a wonderfully good arrangement of my books, the remains of which are better than I had expected. Still, I wish you would send me a couple of your library slaves for Tyrannio to employ as gluers,³ and in other subordinate work, and tell them to get some fine parchment⁴ to make title-pieces, which you Greeks, I think, call "sillybi." But all this is only if not inconvenient to you. In any case, be sure you come yourself, if you can halt for a while in such a place, and can persuade Pilia⁵ to accompany you. For that is only fair, and

¹ A town in Latium, on the Mediterranean, where one of Cicero's villas was situated.

² His librarian.

³ Their duty would be to glue together the separate leaves of papyrus used in making up a roll.

⁴ A strip of parchment, on which the title of the book was written, was attached to the roll.

⁵ Atticus' wife.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

own. Moreover, an extraordinary coincidence has occurred which seems to support my opinion and to guarantee your kindness. For just as I was speaking to our friend Balbus about this very Trebatius at my house, with more than usual earnestness, a letter from you was handed to me, at the end of which you say: "Miscinius Rufus, whom you recommend to me, I will make king of Gaul, or, if you choose, put him under the care of Lepta.¹ Send me some one else to promote." I and Balbus both lifted our hands in surprise: it came so exactly in the nick of time, that it appeared to be less the result of mere chance than something providential. I therefore send you Trebatius, and on two grounds, first that it was my spontaneous idea to send him, and secondly, because you have invited me to do so. I would beg you, dear Caesar, to receive him with such a display of kindness as to concentrate on his single person all that you can be possibly induced to bestow for my sake upon my friends. As for him I guarantee — not in the sense of that hackneyed expression of mine, at which, when I used it in writing to you about Milo, you very properly jested, but in good Roman language such as sober men use — that no honester, better, or more modest man exists. Added to this, he is at the top of his profession as a jurisconsult, possesses an unequalled memory, and the most profound learning. For such a man I ask neither a tribuneship, prefecture, nor any definite office, I ask only your good-will and liberality: and yet I do not wish to prevent your complimenting him, if it so please you, with even these marks of distinction. In fact, I transfer him entirely from my hand, so to speak, to yours, which is as sure a pledge of good faith as of victory. Excuse my being somewhat importunate, though with a man like you there can hardly be any pretext for it—however, I feel that it will be allowed to pass. Be careful of your health and continue to love me as ever.

¹ A friend of Cicero's, who was with Caesar in Gaul.

TO HIS BROTHER QUINTUS, IN GAUL

(Q. Fr. III., 7.)

TUSCULUM,¹ B. C. 54.

AT Rome, and especially on the Appian road as far as the temple of Mars, there is a remarkable flood. The promenade of Crassipes has been washed away, pleasure grounds, a great number of shops. There is a great sheet of water right up to the public fishpond. That doctrine of Homer's is in full play:—

“The days in autumn when in violent flood Zeus pours his waters, wroth at sinful men” —

for it falls in with the acquittal of Gabinius —

“Who wrench the law to suit their crooked ends
And drive out justice, recking naught of Gods.”

But I have made up my mind not to care about such things. When I get back to Rome I will write and tell you my observations, and especially about the dictatorship, and I will also send a letter to Labienus and one to Ligurius. I write this before daybreak by the carved wood lampstand, in which I take great delight, because they tell me that you had it made when you were at Samos. Good-bye, dearest and best of brothers.

¹ About ten miles southeast of Rome. Cicero had a villa there.

TO C. TREBATIUS TESTA, IN GAUL

(Fam. VII., 16.)

ROME, B. C. 54.

IN the "Trojan Horse,"¹ just at the end, you remember the words, "Too late they learn wisdom." You, however, old man, were wise in time. Those first snappy² letters of yours were foolish enough, and then . . . ! I don't at all blame you for not being over-curious in regard to Britain.³ For the present, however, you seem to be in winter quarters somewhat short of warm clothing, and therefore not caring to stir out: —

" Not here and there, but everywhere,
Be wise and ware:
No sharper steel can warrior bear."

If I had been by way of dining out, I would not have failed your friend Cn. Octavius; to whom, however, I did remark upon his repeated invitations, "Pray, who are you?" But, by Hercules, joking apart, he is a pretty fellow: I could have wished you had taken him with you! Let me know for certain what you are doing and whether you intend coming to Italy at all this winter. Balbus has assured me that you will be rich. Whether he speaks after the simple Roman fashion, meaning that you will be well supplied with money, or according to the Stoic dictum, that "all are rich who can enjoy the sky and the earth," I shall know here-

¹ A play by one of the earlier Roman dramatists, either Livius or Naevius.

² The first letters written by Trebatius after going to Gaul seem to have been full of complaints.

³ Trebatius did not cross the Channel.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY
BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

pinum, my brother came to see me, and our first subject of conversation was yourself, and we discussed it at great length. After this I brought the conversation round to what you and I had discussed at Tusculum, on the subject of your sister. I never saw anything so gentle and placable as my brother was on that occasion in regard to your sister: so much so, indeed, that if there had been any cause of quarrel on the score of expense, it was not apparent. So much for that day. Next day we started from Arpinum. A country festival caused Quintus to stop at Arcanum; I stopped at Aquinum; but we lunched at Arcanum. You know his property there. When we got there Quintus said, in the kindest manner, "Pomponia, do you ask the ladies in; I will invite the men." Nothing, as I thought, could be more courteous, and that, too, not only in the actual words, but also in his intention and the expression of face. But she, in the hearing of us all, exclaimed, "I am only a stranger here!" The origin of that was, as I think, the fact that Statius had preceded us to look after the luncheon. Thereupon Quintus said to me, "There, that's what I have to put up with every day!" You will say, "Well, what does that amount to?" A great deal; and, indeed, she had irritated even me: her answer had been given with such unnecessary acrimony, both of word and look. I concealed my annoyance. We all took our places at table except her. However, Quintus sent her dishes from the table, which she declined. In short, I thought I never saw anything better-tempered than my brother, or crosser than your sister: and there were many particulars which I omit that raised my bile more than they did that of Quintus himself. I then went on to Aquinum; Quintus stopped at Arcanum, and joined me early the next day at Aquinum. He told me that she had refused to sleep with him, and when on the point of leaving, she behaved just as I had seen her. Need I say more? You may tell her herself that in my judgment she showed a marked want of kindness on that day. I have told you this story at greater length, perhaps, than was necessary, to convince you that you, too, have something to do in the way of giving her instruction and advice.

There only remains for me to beg you to complete all my commissions before leaving town; to give Pomptinus¹ a push, and make him start; to let me know as soon as you have left town, and to believe that, by heaven, there is nothing I love and find more pleasure in than yourself.

I said a most affectionate good-bye to that best of men, A. Torquatus, at Minturnae, to whom I wish you would remark, in the course of conversation, that I have mentioned him in my letter.

CICERO AND HIS SON TO TERENTIA AND TULLIA, IN ROME²

(Fam. XIV., 14.)

MINTURNAE, B. C. 49.

TULLIUS to Terentia, her father to Tullia, his two sweethearts, and Cicero to his excellent mother and darling sister, send warm greetings. If you are well, we are so too. It is now for you to consider, and not for me only, what you must do. If Caesar means to come to Rome in a peaceable manner, you can stay at home with safety for the present : but if in his madness he is going to give up the city to plunder, I fear Dolabella¹ himself may not be able to protect us sufficiently. Besides, I am alarmed lest we should be cut off from you, so that when you do wish to leave town you may be prevented. There is one other thing, which you are in the best position to observe yourselves — are other ladies of your rank remaining in Rome? If not, it deserves consideration whether you can do so with propriety. As things stand at present, indeed, always provided that I am allowed to hold this district, you will be able to stay with me or on one of our estates with the greatest comfort. There is another thing I am afraid of — a want of provisions in the city before long. On these points pray consult with Pomponius,² with Camillus, with anybody you think right: above all don't be frightened. Labienus has made things better for us. Piso, too, is helpful in quitting the city and declaring his own son-in-law guilty of treason. Do you, dear hearts, write to me as often as possible, and tell me how you are and what is going on around you. Quintus and his son and Rufus send their love. Good-bye!

¹ An old friend of Cicero's, who was to be one of his lieutenants in Cilicia.

² Cicero had taken part in the general flight from Rome that followed the news of Caesar's having crossed the Rubicon.

¹ Tullia's second husband, who belonged to Caesar's party.

² Atticus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

perplexities for me, and help me with your advice, though I expect by this time you are in a warm corner yourself at Rome. However, do the best you can. If I learn anything fresh to-day, I will let you know. For the consuls will be here directly on the 5th, the date they fixed themselves. I shall look for a letter from you every day. But do answer this as soon as you can. I left the ladies and the two boys at Formiae.

SERVIUS SULPICIUS¹ TO CICERO, AT ASTURA²

(Fam. IV., 5.)

ATHENS, B. C. 45.

WHEN I received the news of your daughter Tullia's death, I was indeed as much grieved and distressed as I was bound to be, and looked upon it as a calamity in which I shared. For if I had been at home, I should not have failed to be at your side, and should have made my sorrow plain to you face to face. That kind of consolation involves much distress and pain, because the relations and friends, whose part it is to offer it, are themselves overcome by an equal sorrow. They cannot attempt it without many tears, so that they seem to require consolation themselves rather than to be able to afford it to others. Still I have decided to set down briefly for your benefit such thoughts as have occurred to my mind, not because I suppose them to be unknown to you, but because your sorrow may perhaps hinder you from being so keenly alive to them.

¹ The collection of letters Ad Familiares includes many letters to Cicero by various correspondents. Among the best known is this letter of consolation written by the distinguished jurist and orator Servius Sulpicius Rufus, on the death of Cicero's daughter, Tullia.

² Cicero had a villa upon an island at the mouth of the Astura, a river in Latium flowing into the Mediterranean.

Why is it that a private grief should agitate you so deeply? Think how fortune has hitherto dealt with us. Reflect that we have had snatched¹ from us what ought to be no less dear to human beings than their children — country, honor, rank, every political distinction. What additional wound to your feelings could be inflicted by this particular loss? Or where is the heart that should not by this time have lost all sensibility and learn to regard everything else as of minor importance? Is it on her account, pray, that you sorrow? How many times have you recurred to the thought — and I have often been struck with the same idea — that in times like these theirs is far from being the worst fate to whom it has been granted to exchange life for a painless death? Now what was there at such an epoch that could greatly tempt her to live? What scope, what hope, what heart's solace? That she might spend her life with some young and distinguished husband? How impossible for a man of your rank to select from the present generation of young men a son-in-law, to whose honor you might think yourself safe in trusting your child! Was it that she might bear children to cheer her with the sight of their vigorous youth? who might by their own character maintain the position handed down to them by their parent, might be expected to stand for the offices in their order, might exercise their freedom in supporting their friends? What single one of these prospects has not been taken away before it was given?

¹ By the triumph of the Caesarian party.

But, it will be said, after all it is an evil to lose one's children. Yes, it is: only it is a worse one to endure and submit to the present state of things.

I wish to mention to you a circumstance which gave me no common consolation, on the chance of its also proving capable of diminishing your sorrow. On my voyage from Asia, as I was sailing from Aegina towards Megara, I began to survey the localities that were on every side of me. Behind me was Aegina, in front Megara, on my right Piraeus, on my left Corinth: towns which at one time were most flourishing, but now lay before my eyes in ruin and decay. I began to reflect to myself thus: "Ah! do we manikins feel rebellious if one of us perishes or is killed — we whose life ought to be still shorter — when the corpses of so many towns lie in helpless ruin? Will you please, Servius, restrain yourself and recollect that you are born a mortal man?" Believe me, I was no little strengthened by that reflection. Now take the trouble, if you agree with me, to put this thought before your eyes. Not long ago all those most illustrious men perished at one blow:¹ the empire of the Roman people suffered that huge loss: all the provinces were shaken to their foundations. If you have become the poorer by the frail spirit of one poor girl, are you agitated thus violently? If she had not died now, she would yet have had to die a few years hence, for she was mortal born. You, too, withdraw soul and thought from such things, and rather remember those which become the part you have played in life: that she lived as long as life had anything to give her; that her life outlasted that of the Republic; that she lived to see you — her own father — praetor, consul, and augur; that she

¹ The defeat of the Pompeians by Caesar at Pharsalus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

you are able to bear bad fortune equally well, and that it does not appear to you to be a heavier burden than you ought to think it. I would not have this be the only one of all the virtues that you do not possess.

As far as I am concerned, when I learn that your mind is more composed, I will write you an account of what is going on here, and of the condition of the province. Good-bye.

TO ATTICUS, IN ROME

(Att. XV., 16 a.)

ASTURA, B. C. 44.

AT length a letter-carrier from my son?¹ And, by Hercules, a letter elegantly expressed, showing in itself some progress. Others also give me excellent reports of him. Leonides,² however, still sticks to his favorite "at present." But Herodes² speaks in the highest terms of him. In short, I am glad even to be deceived in this matter, and am not sorry to be credulous. Pray let me know if Statius has written to you anything of importance to me.

CICERO, THE YOUNGER, TO TIRO³

(Fam. XVI., 21.)

ATHENS, B. C. 44.

AFTER I had been anxiously expecting letter-carriers day after day, at length they arrived forty-six

¹ Marcus, who was at the time a student in Athens.

² Whose lectures Marcus was attending.

³ Cicero's freedman and confidential secretary. It was he who days after they left you. Their arrival was most welcome to me: for while I took the greatest possible pleasure in the letter of the kindest and most beloved of fathers, still your most delightful letter put a finishing stroke to my joy. So I no longer repent of having suspended writing for a time, but am rather rejoiced at it; for I have reaped a great reward in your kindness from my pen having been silent. I am therefore exceedingly glad that you have unhesitatingly accepted my excuse. I am sure, dearest Tiro, that the reports about me which reach you answer your best wishes and hopes. I will make them good, and will do my best that this belief in me, which day by day becomes more and more en évidence, shall be doubled. Wherefore you may with confidence and assurance fulfil your promise of being the trumpeter of my reputation. For the errors of my youth have caused me so much remorse and suffering, that not only does my heart shrink from what I did, my very ears abhor the mention of it. And of this anguish and sorrow I know and am assured that you have taken your share. And I don't wonder at it! for while you wished me all success for my sake, you did so also for your own; for I have ever meant you to be my partner in all my good fortunes. Since, therefore, you have suffered sorrow through me, I will now take care that through me your joy shall be doubled. Let me assure you that my very close attachment to Cratippus¹ is that of a son rather than a pupil: for though I enjoy his lectures, I am also specially edited the letters Ad Familiares. The modern tone of this letter, written by a university student to his father's man of business, will be noticed.

¹ The distinguished Peripatetic philosopher.

charmed with his delightful manners. I spend whole days with him, and often part of the night: for I induce him to dine with me as often as possible. This intimacy having been established, he often drops in upon us unexpectedly while we are at dinner, and laying aside the stiff airs of a philosopher joins in our jests with the greatest possible freedom. He is such a man — so delightful, so distinguished — that you should take pains to make his acquaintance at the earliest possible opportunity. I need hardly mention Brutius,¹ whom I never allow to leave my side. He is a man of a strict and moral life, as well as being the most delightful company. For in him fun is not divorced from literature and the daily philosophical inquiries which we make in common. I have hired a residence next door to him, and as far as I can with my poor pittance² I subsidize his narrow means. Furthermore, I have begun practising declamation in Greek with Cassius; in Latin I like having my practice with Brutius. My intimate friends and daily company are those whom Cratippus brought with him from Mitylene — good scholars, of whom he has the highest opinion. I also see a great deal of Epicrates, the leading man at Athens, and Leonides,³ and other men of that sort. So now you know how I am going on.

You remark in your letter on the character of Gorgias.⁴ The fact is, I found him very useful in my daily practice of declamation; but I subordinated

¹ Known only from this passage.

² About $4000 a year.

³ He had written to Cicero somewhat unfavorably about his son.

⁴ A distinguished rhetorician, but a man of dissolute habits. He seems to have encouraged young Marcus in dissipation, and Cicero had objected to his son's intimacy with him.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

TO GAIUS TREBONIUS, IN ASIA¹

(Fam. X., 28.)

ROME, B. C. 43.

How I could wish that you had invited me to that most glorious banquet on the Ides of March!² We should have had no leavings!³ While, as it is, we are having such a trouble with them, that the magnificent service which you men then did the state leaves room for some grumbling. In fact, for Antony's having been taken out of the way by you, — the best of men, — and that it was by your kindness that this pest still survives, I sometimes do feel, though perhaps I have no right to do so, a little angry with you. For you have left behind an amount of trouble which is greater for me than for every one else put together.

For as soon as a meeting of the senate could be freely held, after Antony's very undignified departure, I returned to that old courage of mine, which along with that gallant citizen, your father, you ever had upon your lips and in your heart. For the tribunes having summoned the senate for the 20th of December, and having brought a different piece of business before it, I reviewed the situation as a whole,⁴ and spoke with the greatest fire, and tried all I could to recall the now languid and wearied senate to its ancient and traditional valor, more by an exhibition of high spirit than of eloquence.

¹ Trebonius had taken a prominent part in the conspiracy which resulted in the assassination of Caesar. He afterwards went as pro-consul to the province of Asia.

² The date of the assassination.

³ Cicero would have had Antony killed too.

⁴ The speech alluded to is the third Philippic.

This day and this earnest appeal from me were the first things that inspired the Roman people with the hope of recovering its liberty. And had not I supposed that a gazette of the city and of all acts of the senate was transmitted to you, I would have written you out a copy with my own hand, though I have been overpowered with a multiplicity of business. But you will learn all that from others. From me you shall have a brief narrative, and that a mere summary. Our senate is courageous, but the consulars are partly timid, partly disaffected. We have had a great loss in Servius.¹ Lucius Caesar entertains the most loyal sentiments, but, being Antony's uncle, he refrains from very strong language in the senate. The consuls are splendid. Decimus Brutus is covering himself with glory. The youthful Caesar² is behaving excellently, and I hope he will go on as he has begun. You may at any rate be sure of this — that, had he not speedily enrolled the veterans, and had not the two legions transferred themselves from Antony's army to his command, and had not Antony been confronted with that danger, there is no crime or cruelty which he³ would have omitted to practise. Though I suppose these facts too have been told you, yet I wished you to know them still better. I will write more when I get more leisure.

¹ Servius Sulpicius Rufus, who had died while on an embassy to Antony.

² Afterwards Augustus.

³ Antony.

CAESAR

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

INDISPUTABLY the greatest personality in Roman history, Caesar, in addition to his epoch-making achievements as a statesman and as a general, showed throughout his career a keen interest in various branches of literature and science. His writings included commentaries on the Gallic and on the Civil War, a grammatical treatise on Analogy which is said to have been composed during a journey from Italy to Transalpine Gaul, a work dealing with some problems of astronomy, a pamphlet against Cato Minor, written in the camp at Munda in answer to the panegyric which Cicero had published shortly after Cato's suicide at Utica, some poems, and many letters and speeches. (Of these the commentaries alone have come down to us, the others being known only through the testimony of contemporary or later authors or from a few fragments which have survived.

He was born in 100 B. C. The Julian gens, to which he belonged, was of patrician rank, and more than one of its members had already attained to the consulship. Of his early life and education, little is known, but one of his tutors is said to have been the Gaul M. Antonius Gniphos, a rhetorician of some repute. Through the marriage of his father's sister to Marius, he was during his boyhood and youth brought in close contact with the great popular leader, and this connection undoubtedly did much to develop in him the democratic spirit which helped to make him the idol of the Roman masses. His wife was Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna, the famous adherent of Marius. He began his

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

It is perhaps the element of restraint and reserve that contributes most to the effectiveness of Caesar's style. His narrative, moreover, is marked by a sustained objectivity: he writes as if he had been only a spectator of the events of which he was so great a part. Carefully avoiding all merely rhetorical devices, and using only the purest Latin, he tells his story with the utmost directness, simplicity, and clearness.

THE SIEGE OF ALESIA¹

Taken from the narrative based on De Bello Gallico, VII., 69–89, in T. Rice Holmes' Caesar's Conquest of Gaul.

NEXT day the Romans arrived at Alesia, where Vercingetorix was preparing to make his final stand. The column descended a valley closed on the right and the left by the hills of Bussy and Pevenel. On their left front, connected with Pevenel by a broad neck of land, rose a hill, much lower than Gergovia,² but still too steep to be taken by assault. The Gauls were swarming on the eastern slope, beneath the scarped rocks of the plateau, on which stood the town; and Vercingetorix had made them build a wall and dig a ditch to protect their encampment. Just at their feet the legions saw a stream, the Oze, winding like a steely thread through the greenery that fringed the north of the hill; and beyond its southern side, ¹ Alesia, the capital of the Mandubii, now Alise Ste. Reine on Mont Auxois, west of Dijon, was the scene of the last concerted attempt on the part of the Gauls to free themselves from Roman rule. That this rebellion of 52 B. C., which had begun in the country of the Arverni, the modern Auvergne, became a national one was due very largely to the enthusiastic patriotism and personal magnetism of the young Arvernian chieftain Vercingetorix. It was only after many months of fighting that Caesar forced the rebels to retreat to Alesia.

² The capital of the Arverni, upon which Caesar had made an unsuccessful attack.

parallel to the Oze, but invisible, flowed the little river Ozerain. Moving down past the hill of Réa, the soldiers came to a miniature plain, which extended, three miles in length, beneath the western slope of Alesia, and was bounded on its further side by a range of heights; the river Brenne, which received the waters of the Oze and the Ozerain, meandered through it from south to north; and beyond the Ozerain the steep declivities of Flavigny completed the zone of hills.

Caesar harangued his troops and encouraged them to brace themselves for a toilsome effort. As it was evident that the place could not be taken except by a blockade, he drew a line of investment, fully ten miles in length, along which a ring of camps was constructed. Those intended for the cavalry were on low ground, — three in the plain and one in the valley of the Rabutin, which entered the Oze from the north. The rest were strongly placed upon the slopes of the outlying hills. Close to the camps redoubts or block-houses, twenty-three in all, were thrown up; and strong pickets were placed in them, to guard against any sudden sortie.

Soon after the commencement of the works, Vercingetorix sent all his cavalry down the hill; and a desperate combat was fought in the western plain. Caesar's Gallic¹ and Spanish horse were soon in trouble; and he sent his Germans to reinforce them. The legions were drawn up in front of their camps, to deter the enemy's foot from attempting a sortie. The Gauls were beaten, and galloped back along the valleys of the Oze and the Ozerain, hotly pursued by the Germans: but the gates of the camp being too narrow, many of the thronging fugitives were cut down ; while others threw themselves off their horses and tried to scramble over the wall. The legions, by Caesar's order, moved forward a little. The Gauls inside the wall were smitten with panic : " To arms ! " they cried, " To arms ! " Many of them fled helter-skelter up the hillside ; and Vercingetorix was obliged to shut the gates of the town, for fear the camp should be left unprotected.

¹ Some of the Gauls had adhered to Caesar.

He saw with dismay that the toils were closing around him. He had never expected that Caesar, who had failed so ignominiously at Gergovia, would be strong enough to attempt a systematic blockade. But there were now ten legions instead of six ; and wherever he looked, over the plain or down in the valleys, there were soldiers at work with axe or spade. There was nothing for it but to appeal to the whole Gallic people to extricate him from the trap in which he was caught. The ring of redoubts was not yet complete : the Romans were far too few to blockade the whole circuit of the mountains ; and the cavalry might perhaps steal out in the dark without attracting notice. He charged them to go, each to his own country, and bring back with them every man who could wield a sword. He reminded them of all that he had done for the good cause, and adjured them not to abandon him to the vengeance of the Romans. Everything depended on their using all speed : if they left him to perish, the whole garrison would perish with him. By reducing the rations, he reckoned that he might make the provisions last a little over a month. Silently up each river valley sped the shadowy cavalcade, until it was lost to view.

Caesar learned the whole story from some deserters.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

intervening valleys and the plain. The circuit of this line was fully ten miles.

But even these works were not deemed sufficient. The Gauls made frequent and furious sallies. Comparatively few of the Romans were available as combatants; for many had to go in quest of corn and timber, while others were laboring on the works. Caesar therefore invented various subsidiary defences. Ditches, five feet deep, were dug just inside the large moat that was filled with water; and five rows of strong boughs were fixed in each, with one end protruding above ground, sharpened and with the branches projecting so as to form a kind of abatis. In front of them and rising a few inches above the ground, but purposely concealed by brushwood, were sharp pointed logs embedded in small pits. In front of these again, concealed, but barely concealed, beneath the turf, were barbed spikes fixed in pieces of wood. Fringed by these formidable defences, Caesar expected that contravallation and circumvallation would be alike impregnable.

Nevertheless, the struggle was likely to be prolonged; and it would certainly tax to the utmost the endurance and the fighting power of the men. As soon as the relieving army should arrive, the Romans would be hemmed in between two desperate enemies. Every moment for preparation was precious. Flying parties scoured the country for corn and provender: but they could not collect a sufficient supply; and the rations had to be reduced. Every day, — even by night, when the moon was up, or in the glow of the watch-fires, — the besieged could see the indefatigable legionaries laboring to finish their works before the time for the great hazard should arrive.

Meanwhile Vercingetorix had abandoned his camp, and withdrawn the troops who occupied it into the town. He took every precaution to husband his scanty resources. He ordered the whole of the grain to be thrown into one common stock and brought to him for safe keeping; and he let it be known that disobedience would be punished with death. From time to time each man received his scanty ration. Meat was tolerably abundant; for the Mandubii had driven large numbers of cattle into the stronghold.

The appeal of Vercingetorix had meanwhile been answered. A council of chieftains met to consider the situation. Vercingetorix, in his great need, had asked for an universal levy: but the cooler judgment of the council rejected his demand. So vast a multitude would become unmanageable; and it would be impossible to find food for so many mouths. It was resolved, therefore, to call upon each tribe for a limited contingent. The summons was obeyed with alacrity; and from north and south and east and west, from the Seine, the Loire and the Garonne, from the marshes of the Scheldt and the Sambre and the mountains of the Vosges and the Cevennes, from the Channel and the Atlantic Ocean, horse and foot came swarming to save the hero of Gaul. But even in this supreme moment, in one instance, tribal jealousy prevailed over patriotism. The Bellovaci peremptorily refused to send a single man. They intended, they said, to attack Caesar on their own account, and had no intention of being dictated to by any one. They consented, however, as a personal favor to Commius, king of the Atrebates, who had great influence with them, to despatch a small contingent. Four generals were chosen; for, except Vercingetorix himself, there was no one leader of sufficient eminence to command universal confidence. And, as if this weakening of authority were not enough, the generals were fettered by civil commissioners, whose instructions they were to follow in the conduct of the campaign. One of the four was Commius, who had, in former years, rendered good service to Caesar, but was now swept away on the wave of patriotic enthusiasm. He had indeed good reason to abhor the Roman name. Just before the outbreak of the rebellion, Labienus¹ had discovered that he was conspiring against Caesar, and had sent the tribune Volusenus to assassinate him. He escaped with a wound; and now he saw a prospect of taking his revenge. His brother generals were Eporedorix and Viridomarus, representing the Aedui, and Vercassivellaunus, a cousin of Vercingetorix. The vast host mustered in the country of the Aedui, eight thousand horsemen and nearly two hundred and fifty thousand foot, and marched for Alesia in the certain confidence of victory.

By this time the garrison were in great straits. Their grain was all consumed.² Day after day they strained their eyes, trying to catch a glimpse of the relieving army: but there was never a sign. At length the chieftains called a council of war. Some advised surrender: others were clamorous for a grand sortie: but one proposal equalled in atrocity the worst that has been told of Jerusalem or Samaria. An Arvernian chieftain, called Critognatus, reminded his hearers that their fathers, when driven into their

¹ At this time Caesar's most trusted officer. At the outbreak of the Civil War he deserted to Pompey.

² According to Napoleon I. (Précis des guerres de César, 1836, p. 110), more than 50 days must have elapsed between the departure of Vercingetorix's cavalry and the arrival of the relieving army.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

gencies, along the outer and the inner lines. Archers were scattered among the Gallic ranks; and the arrows fell so thick and fast that scores of wounded horsemen were seen riding off the field. Every man fought like a hero; for they knew that from the heights around friends and enemies alike were anxiously watching. The numbers of the Gauls began to tell; and their countrymen, behind and before, encouraged them by loud yells. All through the afternoon the battle raged uncertain. But towards sunset the ever-victorious Germans charged in a compact body, and threw the division opposed to them into disorder: the archers were exposed and killed: the rout was general; and the besieged who had sallied forth turned in despair, and reascended the hill.

But Commius and his brother generals were still hopeful. Next day their men were hard at work, making fascines and scaling ladders for a grand assault on the Roman lines. About midnight they quitted their camp, and moved in silence across the plain. As they approached the works, they raised a simultaneous shout, to put the besieged on the alert; and, as they flung their fascines into the ditch, the trumpet was heard, calling the garrison to arms. Stones flew from slings: arrows whizzed through the air; and, though the Romans too plied their slings, and supports hurried from the neighboring redoubts to the relief of any point that was too hardly pressed, the enemy were too many for them, and they suffered heavily: but when those ghost-like companies rushed in to storm the rampart, they trod upon the spikes, or, stumbling into the holes, impaled themselves on the pointed logs, while heavy pikes were hurled down from the towers into the seething multitude. The Roman artillery made great havoc. The losses on either side were very heavy; for they were fighting in the dark, and shields were of little use. Towards dawn the Gauls retreated, fearing an attack in flank; and the besieged, who had lost much valuable time in attempting to cross the inner trench, went back before they could strike a blow.

One more chance remained. The leaders of the relieving army questioned the rustics about the lie of the ground on the north and the nature of the Roman defences. Mont Réa, which bounded the plain and rose above the further bank of the Oze, extended so far to the north that Caesar had not been able to enclose it in his line of circumvallation. On the southern slope, close to the stream, stood one of the Roman camps. It was held by two legions, — perhaps about eight thousand men, — under Reginus and Caninius. In order to avoid observation, it would be necessary to approach the camp by a wide détour. The Gauls sent scouts to reconnoitre. It appeared that Mont Réa was connected by a ridge with a further group of heights. Just after dark sixty thousand picked men, under the command of Vercassivellaunus, left the Gallic camp, and, passing right round the sweep of the northern hills, halted at daybreak for a rest in a hollow north-east of Mont Réa. About noon, just as they were moving down on the camp, the cavalry, by a preconcerted arrangement, streamed over the plain towards the Roman lines: the rest of the infantry showed themselves in front of their encampment; and Vercingetorix, observing these movements from the citadel, descended the hill and moved towards the plain.

This time there was no delay. The inner trench was filled up, where necessary, with earth and fascines : stout sappers' huts, destined to protect the men when they should approach to storm the lines, long poles fitted with hooks for tearing down the rampart, and other implements which Vercingetorix had provided, were carried across ; and the besieged moved on to make their last effort.

A desperate struggle then began. Wherever there was a weak spot in the defences, the Gauls threw themselves upon it ; and the Romans, comparatively few in numbers, and scattered owing to the vast extent of their lines, found great difficulty in massing themselves upon the exposed points. Moreover, they were painfully distracted by the roar of battle in their rear ; for both on the inner and the outer line men felt, as they fought, that they must perish if their comrades behind suffered the enemy to break through. Yet, agitated as they were, they combated with a nervous eager energy ; and the besieged struggled as desperately as they ; for both knew that that day's fight would decide all : — the Gauls were lost unless they could break the line ; the Romans, if they could but hold that line, saw their long toil at an end. From the slope of Flavigny, south of the Ozerain, the view from which embraced the whole plain, Caesar directed the battle, and sent supports to every point where he saw his men hard pressed. The attack on the circumvallation in the plain was comparatively feeble ; for the bulk of the relieving force was formidable only in numbers. Nor were those numbers wisely directed. The Aedui may have been treacherous : the generals may have disagreed, or they may have been fettered by the civil commissioners ; anyhow the Gauls made no attempt upon the circumvallation, except on Mont Réa

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

a last resource, Labienus summoned every available man from the neighboring redoubts to his aid. By good luck these reinforcements amounted to eleven cohorts, — perhaps four thousand men. And now, conspicuous in his crimson cloak, Caesar was descried, hurrying across the plain. The enemy made a supreme effort. Labienus and his men took heart, and rushed into the thick of the stormers. As Caesar approached, he heard the shouts of the combatants: he saw the camp abandoned and the short swords flashing over the slopes beyond. Suddenly the cavalry appeared on the heights above the enemy's rear: Caesar's reserves came up to attack them in front; and they fled in bewilderment, — into the midst of the hostile squadrons. Vercassivellaunus himself was captured, and seventy-four standards; and of the sixty thousand chosen men who had marched out of camp the night before only a remnant returned. The whole scene was visible from the town; and in despair the officers left in command sent to recall their comrades from below. The vast host without vanished in the gathering darkness. The legions were too tired to follow, or all might have been destroyed: but at midnight the cavalry were sent in pursuit; and when day broke, they were still hunting the fugitives and capturing or slaying them in scores.

All was lost: so Vercingetorix clearly saw. In the night he formed his resolve. Next morning he gathered the tribal chiefs around him. He told them that he had fought, not for himself but for his countrymen; and, since they must needs all bow to fortune, he was ready to place himself at their disposal, — to die, if they wished to appease the Romans by his death, or to yield himself up as a prisoner of war. They accepted his offer, and consented to purchase life by sacrificing the leader of their own choice. Ambassadors were sent to learn the pleasure of the conqueror. He ordered the chiefs of the garrison to be brought out, and all the arms to be surrendered. The chiefs were led forth; and Caesar, seated on his tribunal, received their submission. Vercingetorix, mounted on a gaily caparisoned charger, rode round the tribunal, and then, leaping to the ground, took off his armor, laid down his sword, and bowed himself at Caesar's feet. He was sent to Rome, and imprisoned in a dungeon. Six years later he was brought out, to adorn Caesar's triumph; and then he was put to death.

T. RICE HOLMES.

VIRGIL

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

WHILE in true poetic inspiration, Virgil does not rank with Lucretius or Catullus, yet in his larger conception of the poet's function, in his more artistic handling of his themes, and in his mastery of technique he is far superior to them. He is a product of the Augustan age, with its more settled political and social atmosphere, its wider culture, and its higher ideals of literary art. We miss, it is true, the individual note that marks the work of some of the earlier poets, but in its place is something of fuller volume, an essentially national tone, emanating from one who was possessed with the idea of his country's greatness. In his Georgics he sings the praise of Italian agriculture; his Aeneid is a glorification of the Roman race.

He was born in Mantua in 70 B. C. His parents were plebeians, but sufficiently prosperous to give their son a good education. He received his first training at Cremona, went afterwards to Naples, and finally to Rome. How long he remained at the capital on this occasion is not certain, but we know from the Eclogues that he was in his native place during the troubles caused by the confiscation of lands in northern Italy for the benefit of the veterans of Octavian¹ after the battle of Philippi in 42 B. C. The soldiers, not satisfied with the lands which had been assigned to them around Cremona, proceeded to seize those near Mantua; and it was only through the protection afforded him by Asinius Pollio, the legate in the district, and afterwards

¹ Afterwards the Emperor Augustus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

came from his own experience on his Mantuan estate. A striking feature of the poem is the artistic interweaving of episodes having in themselves little or nothing to do with the main theme. The first book, for example, has a fine description of the portents that appeared just after Caesar's assassination; the second, the famous passage in which the praises of Italy are sung; the fourth, the story of Aristaeus. But this is only one of the devices adopted to lighten a theme that in less skilful hands could hardly have failed to become tedious. We have besides many finely elaborated pictures of nature, picturesque descriptions of rural occupations and activities, little touches of realism, wise saws and homely maxims, — all wrought into a perfect whole by the sure hand of the artist.

In the Aeneid Virgil enters the epic field. It is the story of the coming of Aeneas of Troy and his followers to Italy, and the founding of the Roman state. In the first six books we are told of the sack of Troy by the Greeks, the flight of Aeneas with a remnant of the Trojans, their long wanderings, their visit to Sicily, their stay at Carthage, and Aeneas' descent into Hades. The second half of the poem describes the wars with the natives, ending with the death of Turnus, the young chieftain of the Rutulians, at the hands of Aeneas.

While we must admit the justice of some of the criticisms of the Aeneid, — that the poet has in many passages imitated and even plagiarized from Homer, that there is, especially in the last six books, a lack of that variety of incident which is so characteristic of the Homeric epics, — the poem shows, nevertheless, qualities which give it one of the first places in the list of the world's great epics: descriptive powers of a high order, a wealth of imagery that manifests itself sometimes in similes and metaphors, sometimes in a single word or phrase charged with poetic associations, a rare skill in handling dramatic situations, a perfect mastery of language, and lastly a marvellous command of the dactylic hexameter.

DAMON AND ALPHESIBOEUS¹

(Eclogue VIII.)

SONGS of the shepherds Damon and Alphesiboeus, my theme :

Hearkening to whom with rapture as each in rivalry sung,

Heifers forgot their pasture, upon whose melodies hung

Lynxes smitten with wonder, and every listening stream

Loitered with altered current along its watery way ; 5
Damon and Alphesiboeus shall be our burden to-day.

Sailing already abreast of the great Timavus's hill,² Whether I find thee,³ or coasting around Illyria still,
Comes not the bright day ever when this poor tongue shall be free

Thy fair deeds to proclaim ? Shall I ne'er at liberty be 10

Proudly to waft thy verse o'er earth and her every clime,

Only of Athens worthy, and buskin'd tragedy's prime ?
Thou my Muse's beginning, her song shall finish with thee.

¹ The Eclogue contains the songs of the two shepherds Damon and Alphesiboeus, the former telling of the faithlessness of his mistress, the latter giving the song of a Thessalian girl who is trying by magic to win back her lover.

² The rocks near the mouth of the river Timavus on the north shore of the Adriatic.

³ Pollio, to whom the poem is addressed, was on his way home from a successful campaign in Illyricum, on the east coast of the Adriatic.

Take these strains at thy bidding essayed, and grant me to lay
 Round thy brow these ivies to twine with the con-queror's bay. 15

Hardly as yet from the skies had the night's chill shadow dispersed,
 Dew lay sweet on the spring-tide grass for the cattle
 athirst;
 Propped on an olive staff thus sang young Damon,
 the first:

(Damon sings.)

Rise, fair star of the morning, and herald the genial day.

I, whom a passion for Nysa the false has served to betray, 20
 Here will lament; and to gods — whose presence attested in vain
 Naught has availed me — in death's last hour once more will complain.
 Begin, my flute of the mountains, with me my Maenalus¹ strain.

Maenalus ever has forests that sing to him; ever a sigh
 Speaks in his pines; to the loves of the shepherds he listens for aye; 25
 Hears Pan piping, who brooked not that reeds should idle remain.
 Begin, my flute of the mountains, with me my Mae-
 nalus strain.

¹ Mt. Maenalus in Arcadia was a haunt of Pan, the god of shepherds.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

'T was in our crofts I saw thee, a girl thy mother beside,
 Plucking the apples dewy, myself thy pilot and guide ;
 Years I had finished eleven, the twelfth was beginning to reign ;
 Scarce was I able to reach from the ground to the branches that snapped.
 Ah, when I saw ! how I perished ! to fatal folly was rapt ! 45
 Begin, my flute of the mountains, with me my Mae-
 nalus strain.

Now have I learned what love is. Among rocks savage and wild
 Tmaros¹ or Rhodope¹ bare him or far Garamantes² for child, —
 Mortal his lineage is not, nor human blood in his veins.
 Begin, my flute of the mountains, with me my Mae-
 nalus strains. 50

Fell love taught one mother³ her sinful hands to imbrue
 Once in her children's blood, and the mother was heartless too.
 Heartless the mother most ? Or was love more cruel and fell ?
 Cruel was love ; thou also, the mother, heartless as well.
 Begin, my flute of the mountains, with me my Mae-
 nalus strain. 55

¹ Names of mountains : Tmaros in Epirus, Rhodope in Thrace.

² A savage tribe in the interior of Africa.

³ Medea.

Now let the wolf turn tail to the sheep ; oaks stubborn have power

Apples golden to bear, on the alder the daffodil flower !

Droppings of amber rich from the bark of the tama-risk rain ;

Screech-owls vie with the swan, and to Orpheus
 Tityrus¹ change ;

Orpheus play for the woods, as Arion² with dolphins range. 60

Begin, my flute of the mountains, with me my Mae-
 nalus strain.

Nay, let the sea drown all. Farewell to the woods.
 I will leap

Here from this mountain crest that for ever watches
 the deep ;

This death-song of the dying for last sad gift let her keep.

Cease, my flute, it is ended, the Maenalus mountain refrain. 65

Thus sang Damon. The answer of Alphesiboeus
 again,

Muses, recount ! Frail mortals to all things cannot attain.

(Alphesiboeus sings.)

Fetch me the water ; with soft wreaths circle the altar divine ;

Burn to the gods rich boughs, heap frankincense on the fire ;

¹ Used here for any shepherd.

² According to the fable he was saved from drowning by a dolphin which he had charmed by his music.

So to the passionless heart of this ice-cold lover of mine

70

I may reach with my magic ; it is but a chant we require.

Homeward bring from the city, my chants, bring
Daphnis again.

Chants from her heavenly station can draw down even
the moon !

Circe once with a chant transformed Ulysses' train.
Cold snakes split in the meadows asunder with chant and with tune !

75

Homeward bring from the city, my chants, bring
Daphnis again.

These three threads, each tinted a separate color, I twine

Round thee first in a circle ; and thrice these altars around

Carry the image — a number uneven is dear to the shrine ; —

In three knots, Amaryllis,¹ let each of the colours be wound.

80

Wind them, prithee, and cry, “ I am weaving Venus's chain.”

Homeward bring from the city, my chants, bring
Daphnis again.

As in a fire that is one and the same, grows harder
the clay,

Softer the wax, may Daphnis be wrought by passion to-day.

¹ She addresses herself.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Often the form of a wolf with these I have seen him assume, 100

And in the forests plunge, or the ghosts call forth from the tomb,

Often remove to an alien field rich harvests of grain.
 Homeward bring from the city, my chants, bring
 Daphnis again.

Carry the ashes without, Amaryllis, and into the brook
 Over thy shoulders fling them, nor venture behind thee to look! 105

These are for Daphnis; he recks nor of gods nor magical strain.

Homeward bring from the city, my chants, bring
 Daphnis again.

Look! As I linger to take it, the cinder itself from the grate

Catches the altar with flickering flames. Good luck on us wait!

Ay, there is something surely, and Hylax barks at the gate! 110

Ought I to hope? Or do lovers their own dreams fashion in vain?

Cease, my chants. From the city he comes, my Daphnis, again.

SIR CHARLES BOWEN.

RULES OF HUSBANDRY

(Georgics, I., 176-203.)

MANY the precepts of the men of old,
 I can recount thee, so thou start not back,
 And such slight cares to learn not weary thee.

And this among the first: Your threshing-floor
 With ponderous roller must be levelled smooth, 5
 And wrought by hand, and fixed with binding chalk,
 Lest weeds arise, or dust a passage win
 Splitting the surface, then a thousand plagues
 Make sport of it: oft builds the tiny mouse
 Her home, and plants her granary, underground, 10
 Or burrow for their bed the purblind moles,
 Or toad is found in hollows, and all the swarm
 Of earth's unsightly creatures; or a huge
 Corn-heap the weevil plunders, and the ant,
 Fearful of coming age and penury. 15
 Mark too, what time the walnut in the woods
 With ample bloom shall clothe her, and bow down
 Her odorous branches: if the fruit prevail,
 Like store of grain will follow, and there shall come
 A mighty winnowing-time with mighty heat; 20
 But if the shade with wealth of leaves abound,
 Vainly your threshing-floor will bruise the stalks
 Swoln but with chaff. Many myself have seen Steep, as they sow, their pulse-seeds, drenching them
 With lees of oil and natron, that the fruit 25
 Might swell within the treacherous pods, and they Make speed to boil at howso' small a fire.
 Yet, culled with caution, proved with patient toil,
 These have I seen degenerate, did not man
 Put forth his hand with power, and year by year 30
 Choose out the largest. So, by fate impelled,
 Speed all things to the worse, and backward borne
 Glide from us; even as who with struggling oars
 Up stream scarce pulls a shallop, if his arms
 Relax but for one moment, and the boat 35
 Is headlong swept adown the hurrying tide.

SIGNS OF BAD WEATHER

(Georgics, I., 351-392.)

AY, and that these things we might win to know
 By certain tokens, heats and showers, and winds
 That bring the frost, the Sire of all himself
 Ordained what warnings in her monthly round
 The moon should give, what bodes the south wind's fall; 5

What oft-repeated sights the herdsman seeing
 Should keep his cattle closer to their stalls.
 No sooner are the winds at point to rise,
 Than either Ocean's firths begin to toss
 And swell, and a dry crackling sound is heard 10
 Upon the heights, or one loud ferment booms
 The beach afar, and through the forest goes
 A murmur multitudinous. By this Scarce can the billow spare the curved keels,
 When swift the sea-gulls from the middle main 15
 Come winging, and their shrieks are shoreward borne,
 When ocean-loving cormorants on dry land
 Besport them, and the hern, her marshy haunts
 Forsaking, mounts above the soaring cloud.
 Oft, too, when wind is toward, the stars thou 'lt see 20
 From heaven shoot headlong, and through murky night

Long trails of fire white-glistening in their wake,
 Or light chaff flit in air with fallen leaves,
 Or feathers on the wave-top float and play.
 But when from regions of the furious North 25
 It lightens, and when thunder fills the halls
 Of Eur¹ and of Zephyr, all the fields

¹ The southeast wind.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

AFTER CAESAR'S DEATH

(Georgics, I., 466-514.)

HE ¹ too it was, when Caesar's light was quenched,
 For Rome had pity, when his bright head he veiled
 In iron-hued darkness, till a godless age
 Trembled for night eternal ; at that time
 Howbeit earth also, and the ocean-plains,
 And dogs obscene, and birds of evil bode
 Gave tokens. Yea, how often have we seen
 Etna, her furnace-walls asunder riven,
 In billowy floods boil o'er the Cyclops' fields,²
 And roll down globes of fire and molten rocks ! 10
 A clash of arms through all the heaven was heard
 By Germany ; strange heavings shook the Alps.
 Yea, and by many through the breathless groves
 A voice was heard with power, and wondrous-pale
 Phantoms were seen upon the dusk of night, 15
 And cattle spake, portentous ! streams stand still,
 And the earth yawns asunder, ivory weeps
 For sorrow in the shrines, and bronzes sweat.
 Up-twirling forests with his eddy tide,
 Madly he bears them down, that lord of floods, 20
 Eridanus,³ till through all the plain are swept Beasts and their stalls together. At that time
 In gloomy entrails ceased not to appear
 Dark-threatening fibres, springs to trickle blood,
 And high-built cities night-long to resound 25
 With the wolves' howling. Never more than then
 From skies all cloudless fell the thunderbolts,

¹ The sun. An eclipse took place in November of the year of the assassination, and there were rumors of many portents.

² Sicily, the fabled home of the Cyclops.

³ The river Po.

Nor blazed so oft the comet's fire of bale.
 Therefore a second time ¹ Philippi saw
 The Roman hosts, with kindred weapons rush 30
 To battle, nor did the high gods deem it hard
 That twice Emathia ² and the wide champaign
 Of Haemus ³ should be fattening with our blood.
 Ay, and the time will come when thereanigh,
 Heaving the earth up with his curved plough, 35
 Some swain will light on javelins by foul rust
 Corroded, or with ponderous harrow strike
 On empty helmets, while he gapes to see
 Bones as of giants from the trench untombed.

JAMES RHOADES.

ITALY

(Georgics, II., 136-176.)

BUT no, not Mede-land with its wealth of woods,
 Fair Ganges, Hermus ⁴ thick with golden silt,
 Can match the praise of Italy; nor Ind,
 Nor Bactria,⁵ nor Panchaia,⁶ one wide tract
 Of incense-teeming sand. Here never bulls
 With nostrils snorting fire upturned the sod
 Sown with the monstrous dragon's teeth, nor crop
 Of warriors bristled thick with lance and helm;
 But heavy harvests and the Massie ⁷ juice

¹ Virgil's geography is vague. The decisive battle between Caesar and Pompey had been fought at Pharsalia in Thessaly. Philippi, where Brutus and Cassius were defeated by Octavian and Antony, was in Macedonia.

² A part of Macedonia.

³ The Balkan range.

⁴ A river in Aeolis in Asia Minor.

⁵ Properly Bactra, the capital of the province of Bactriana in Asia.

⁶ The fabulous spice-isle off the coast of Arabia.

⁷ Mons Massicus in Campania was famous for its vineyards.

Of Bacchus fill its borders, overspread 10
 With fruitful flocks and olives. Hence arose
 The war-horse stepping proudly o'er the plain ;
 Hence thy white flocks, Clitumnus,¹ and the bull,
 Of victims mightiest, which full oft have led,
 Bathed in thy sacred stream, the triumph-pomp 15
 Of Romans to the temples of the gods.
 Here blooms perpetual spring, and summer here
 In months that are not summer's ; twice teem the flocks ;
 Twice doth the tree yield service of her fruit.
 But ravening tigers come not nigh, nor breed 20
 Of savage lion, nor aconite betrays
 Its hapless gatherers, nor with sweep so vast Doth the scaled serpent trail his endless coils
 Along the ground, or wreath him into spires.
 Mark too her cities, so many and so proud, 25
 Of mighty toil the achievement, town on town
 Up rugged precipices heaved and reared,
 And rivers undergliding ancient walls.
 Or should I celebrate the sea that laves 29
 Her upper² shores and lower ?³ or those broad lakes ?
 Thee, Larius,⁴ greatest and, Benacus,⁵ thee
 With billowy uproar surging like the main ?
 Or sing her harbors, and the barrier cast
 Athwart the Lucrine,⁶ and how ocean chafes
 With mighty bellowings, where the Julian wave 35

¹ A river of Umbria, in the neighborhood of which a famous breed of white cattle was reared.

² The Adriatic Sea.

³ The Tyrrhenian Sea.

⁴ Lago di Como.

⁵ Lago di Garda.

⁶ Lucrinus and Avernus were two small lakes on the Campanian coast, connected with the sea and with one another by a channel, and used as a harbor. A strong breakwater had been built by Octavian on the strip of land that separated Lucrinus from the sea.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Fierce feud arises, and at once from far
 You may discern what passion sways the mob,
 And how their hearts are throbbing for the strife ; 5
 Hark ! the hoarse brazen note that warriors know
 Chides on the loiterers, and the ear may catch
 A sound that mocks the war-trump's broken blasts ;
 Then in hot haste they muster, then flash wings,
 Sharpen their pointed beaks and knit their thews, 10
 And round the king, even to his royal tent,
 Throng rallying, and with shouts defy the foe.
 So when a dry spring and clear space is given,
 Forth from the gates they burst, they clash on high ;
 A din arises ; they are heaped and rolled 15
 Into one mighty mass, and headlong fall,
 Not denselier hail through heaven, nor pelting so
 Rains from the shaken oak its acorn-shower.
 Conspicuous by their wings, the chiefs themselves
 Press through the heart of battle, and display 20
 A giant's spirit in each pigmy frame,
 Steadfast no inch to yield till these or those
 The victor's ponderous arm has turned to flight.

JAMES RHOADES.

AENEAS' DESCENT INTO HADES

(Aeneid, VI.)

WEEPING he spake, then gave to his flying vessels the rein,
 Gliding at last on the wind to Euboean Cumae's¹
 plain.

¹ On the coast of Campania. It was colonized from Chalcis in Euboea.

Seaward the bows are pointed, an anchor's hook to
the land

Fastens the ships, and the sterns in a long line border the strand.

Troy's young warriors leap with exultant hearts from the bark 5

Forth upon Italy's soil. Some look for the fiery spark

Hid in the secret veins of the flint; some scour the profound

Forest, and wild beasts' cover, and show where waters abound.

While the devout Aeneas a temple seeks on the height,

Phoebus's mountain throne, and a cavern vast as the
night, 10

Where in mysterious darkness the terrible Sibyl¹ lies, Maiden upon whose spirit the Delian seer² of the skies

Breathes his immortal thought, and the knowledge of doom untold.

Soon they arrive at Diana's grove and her palace of gold.

Flying, as legends tell, from the thraldom of Minos³
the king, 15

Daedalus,⁴ trusting the heavens, set forth on adventurous wing;

Sailed for the ice-bound north by a way unimagined
and strange;

Airily poising at last upon this Chalcidian range,

¹ The Cumaean Sibyl.

² Apollo.

³ King of Crete.

⁴ The famous artisan of Attic and Cretan mythology.

Here first touching the land, to Apollo hallowed his light 19
 Oarage of wings ; and a temple colossal built on the site.
 Graved on the doors is the death of Androgeos ;¹
 yonder in turn Attica's land, condemned each year in atonement to yield
 Seven of her children ; the lots are drawn, still standing the urn ;
 Rising from midmost ocean, to match them, Crete is revealed.
 Here is the gloomy romance of the bull, Pasiphaë's² blind 25
 Passion ; and twiformed Minotaur,³ two bodies combined,
 Record of lawless love ; there, marvellous labor, were shaped
 Palace and winding mazes,⁴ from whence no feet had escaped,
 Had not Daedalus pitied the lorn princess⁵ and her love,
 And of himself unentangled the woven trick of the grove, 30
 Guiding her savior's⁶ steps with a thread. Thee, too,
 he had wrought,

¹ Son of Minos, killed by the bull of Marathon, with which Aegeus, king of Attica, had forced him to fight. To avenge his death Minos made war upon Attica, and compelled the Athenians to send once in every nine years seven boys and seven girls to Crete, to be devoured by the Minotaur.

² Wife of Minos.

³ A monster with the body of a man and the head of a bull.

⁴ The Minotaur was kept in the labyrinth built by Daedalus.

⁵ Ariadne, daughter of Minos, who fell in love with Theseus, son of Aegeus, when he came from Athens to kill the Minotaur.

⁶ Theseus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Cried the illumined maiden : “ The God ! lo, here is the God ! ”

Even as she spake, while still on the threshold only
she trod,

Sudden her countenance altered, her cheek grew pale
as in death,

Loose and disordered her fair hair flew, heart panted
for breath, 50

Bosom with madness heaved. More lofty than woman’s her frame,

More than mortal her voice, as the presence of Deity came

Nearer upon her. “ And art thou slow to petition the shrine,

Troy’s Aeneas a laggard at prayer ? — nought else will incline

This charmed temple,” she cries, “ its colossal doors to unclose.” 55

Then stands silent. The veteran bones of the Teu-crians ¹ froze,

Chilled with terror, and prayer from the heart of the monarch arose :

“ Phoebus ! compassionate ever to Troy in the hour of her woe,

Who against haughty Achilles of old didst prosper
the bow 59

Bent by the Dardan Paris, beneath thine auspices led Many a sea I have travelled around great continents spread,

Far as Massylian ² tribes and the quicksands lining their plain.

Italy’s vanishing regions, behold, thy people attain !

¹ The Trojans.

² On the north coast of Africa.

Here may the evil fate of the Trojans leave us at last!
Spare, for 'tis mercy's hour, this remnant of Pergama's¹ race, 65

Gods and goddesses all, whose jealous eyes in the past Looked upon Ilion's¹ glories! From thee I implore one grace,

Prophet of Heaven, dark seer of the future. Grant us the debt,

Long by the destinies owed us — a kingdom promised
of yore —

Foot upon Latium's borders at length may Teucrians set, 70

Bearing their household gods by the tempests tossed evermore!

I, their votary grateful, in Phoebus' and Trivia's² praise

Hewn from the solid marble a glorious fane will raise,
Call by Apollo's name his festival. Also for thee
Shall in our future kingdom a shrine imperial be. 75

There shall thine own dark sayings, the mystic fates
of our line,

Gracious seer, be installed, and a priesthood chosen be thine.

Only entrust not to leaves thy prophecy, maiden divine,

Lest in disorder, the light winds' sport, they be driven on the air;

Chant thyself the prediction." His lips here ended from prayer. 80

Still untamed of Apollo, to stature terrible grown, Raves the prophetic maid in her cavern, fain to dethrone

¹ Troy.

² Diana.

This great God who inspires her — the more with bit
doth he school

Fiery mouth and rebellious bosom and mould her to rule.

Wide on a sudden the hundred enormous mouths of her lair 85

Fly, of themselves unclosing, and answer floats on the air :

“Thou who hast ended at last with the dangers dread of the sea,

Greater on land still wait thee. Lavinium's¹ kingdom afar

Teucra's children shall find — of that ancient terror be free —

Yet shall repent to have found it. I see grim visions of war, 90

Tiber foaming with blood. Once more shall a Simois² flow,

Xanthus be there once more, and the tents of a Dorian³ foe.

Yonder in Latium rises a second Achilles,⁴ and born,

Even as the first, of a goddess; and neither at night
nor at morn

Ever shall Juno leave thee, the Trojans' enemy sworn, 95

While thou pleadest for succor, besieging in misery sore

Each far people and city around Ansonia's⁵ shore !

¹ The city founded by Aeneas in Latium.

² The Simois and Xanthus were the two rivers which flowed through the Trojan plain.

³ Greek.

⁴ Turnus, chief of the Rutuli.

⁵ Italy.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

This was the sire I bore on my shoulders forth from the flame, 115
 Brought through a thousand arrows, that vexed our flight as we came,
 Safe from the ranks of the foeman. He shared my journey with me ;
 Weak as he was, braved ocean, the threats of sky and of sea ;
 More than the common strength or the common fate of the old.
 'T is at his bidding, his earnest prayer long since, I am fain 120
 Thus in petition to seek thy gate. With compassion
 behold
 Father and son, blest maid, for untold thy power, nor in vain
 Over the groves of Avernus¹ hath Hecate² set thee to reign.
 Grace was to Orpheus granted, his bride from the shadows to bring,
 Strong in the power of his lyre and its sounding
 Thracian string. 125
 Still in his turn dies Pollux,³ a brother's life to redeem,
 Travels and ever retravels the journey. Why of the great Theseus⁴ tell thee, or why of Alcides⁵ mighty relate ?

¹ Lake Avernus near Cumae, where there was supposed to be an entrance to the lower world.

² Diana's name in the lower world.

³ Pollux shared his immortality with his brother Castor, who had been born mortal. They lived and died alternately.

⁴ Theseus descended into Hades with Pirithous to assist him in carrying off Proserpina.

⁵ Hercules, whose twelfth labor was to bring up the three-headed dog Cerberus from Hades.

My race, even as theirs, is descended from Jove the supreme.” 129

So evermore he repeated, and still to the altar he clung.
She in reply: “Great Hero, of heaven’s high lineage sprung,

Son of Anchises of Troy, the descent to Avernus¹ is
light;

Death’s dark gates stand open, alike through the day and the night.

But to retrace thy steps and emerge to the sunlight above,

This is the toil and the trouble. A few, whom Jupiter’s love 135

Favors, or whose bright valor has raised them thence to the skies,

Born of the gods, have succeeded. On this side wilderness lies,

Black Cocytus² around it his twilight waters entwines.

Still, if such thy desire, and if thus thy spirit inclines

Twice to adventure the Stygian lake,³ twice look on the dark 140

Tartarus,⁴ and it delights thee on quest so wild to embark,

Learn what first to perform. On a tree no sun that receives

Hides one branch all golden — its yielding stem and its leaves —

Sacred esteemed to the queen of the shadows. Forests of night

Cover it, sloping valleys enclose it around from the
light. 145

¹ Here used to designate the lower world. ² A river of Hades.

³ Where the river Styx widened.

⁴ That part of Hades where the souls of the wicked abode.

Subterranean gloom and its mysteries only may be Reached by the mortal who gathers the golden growth of the tree.

This for her tribute chosen the lovely Proserpina¹ needs

Aye to be brought her. The one bough broken, another succeeds,

Also of gold, and the spray bears leaf of a metal as bright. 150

Deep in the forest explore, and if once thou find it aright,

Pluck it; the branch will follow, of its own grace and design,

Should thy destiny call thee; or else no labor of thine

Ever will move it, nor ever thy hatchet conquer its might.

Yea, and the corpse of a friend, although thou know'st not," she saith, 155

"Lies upon shore unburied, and taints thy vessels with death,

While thou tarriest here at the gate thy future to know.

Carry him home to his rest, in the grave his body bestow;

Death's black cattle provide for the altar; give to the shades

This first lustral oblation, and so on the Stygian glades, 160

Even on realms where never the feet of the living come,

Thou shalt finally look." Then, closing her lips, she was dumb.

¹ Queen of Hades.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Foremost the faithful chieftain. Anon to their tasks they hie ;
 Speed, though weeping sorely, the Sibyl's mission,
 and vie,
 Building the funeral altar with giant trees to the sky.

Into the forest primeval, the beasts' dark cover, they go ; 185

Pine-trees fall with a crash and the holm-oaks ring to the blow.

Ash-hewn timbers and fissile oaks with the wedges are rent ;

Massive ash-trees roll from the mountains down the descent.

Foremost strides Aeneas, as ever, guiding the way,
 Cheering his men, and equipped with a forester's axe
 as they. 190

Long in his own sad thoughts he is plunged — then raising his eyes

Over the measureless forest, uplifts his prayer to the skies.

“ O that in this great thicket the golden branch of the tree

Might be revealed ! For in all she related yonder of thee 194

Ever, alas ! Misenus, the prophetess spake too true.”

Lo ! at the words twain doves came down through the heavenly blue,

And at his side on the green turf lighted. The hero of Troy

Knows the celestial birds of his mother,¹ and cries with joy :

¹ Venus.

“Guide us, if ever a way be, and cleaving swiftly the skies,

Wing for the grove where in shadow a golden branch
overlies 200

One all-favored spot. Nor do thou in an hour that is dark,

Mother, desert thy son!” So saying, he pauses to mark

What be the omens, and whither the birds go. They in their flight,

Soaring, and lighting to feed, keep still in the Teuerians' sight.

When they have come to the valley of baleful Avernus, the pair, 205

Shooting aloft, float up through a bright and radiant
air ;

Both on a tree they have chosen at length their pinions fold

Through whose branches of green is a wavering glimmer of gold.

As in the winter forest a mistletoe often ye see 209

Bearing a foliage young, no growth of its own oak-tree, Circling the rounded boles with a leafage of yellow-
ing bloom ;

Such was the branching gold, as it shone through the
holm-oak's gloom,

So in the light wind rustled the foil. Aeneas with bold Ardor assails it, breaks from the tree the reluctant
gold ; 214

Then to the Sibyl's palace in triumph carries it home.

Weeping for dead Misenus the Trojan host on the shore

Now to his thankless ashes the funeral offerings bore.

Rich with the resinous pine and in oak-hewn timbers
cased

Rises a giant pyre, in its sides dark foliage laced ; Planted in front stand branches of cypress, gifts to the grave ; 220

Over it hang for adornment the gleaming arms of the brave.

Some heat fountain water, the bubbling caldron prepare ;

Clay-cold limbs then wash and anoint. Wail sounds on the air.

Dirge at an end, the departed is placed on the funeral bed ;

O'er him they fling bright raiment, the wonted attire
of the dead. 225

Others shoulder the ponderous bier, sad service of death ;

Some in ancestral fashion the lighted torches beneath
Hold with averted eyes. High blaze on the burning pyre

Incense, funeral viands, and oil outpoured on ' the fire.

After the ashes have fallen and flames are leaping no
more, 230

Wine on the smouldering relics and cinders thirsty they pour.

Next in a vessel of brass Corynaeus¹ gathers the bones,

Thrice bears pure spring water around Troy's sorrowing sons,

Sprinkles it o'er them in dew, from the bough of an olive in bloom, 234

Gives lustration to all, then bids farewell to the tomb.

¹ One of Aeneas' companions.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Slays himself one lamb of a sable fleece to the fell Mother and queen of the Furies, and great Earth, sister of Night,

Killing a barren heifer to thee, thou mistress of Hell. 255

Next for the Stygian monarch a twilight altar he lays ;

Flings on the flames whole bodies of bulls unquartered
 to blaze,

Pours rich oil from above upon entrails burning and
 bright.

When, at the earliest beam of the sun, and the dawn of the light,

Under his feet earth mutters, the mountain forests
 around 260

Seem to be trembling, and hell dogs bay from the shadow profound,

Night's dark goddess approaching. "Avaunt, ye unhallowed, avaunt !"

Thunders the priestess. "Away from a grove that is Hecate's haunt.

Make for the pathway, thou, and unsheathe thy sword ;
 thou hast need, 264

Now, Aeneas, of all thy spirit and valor indeed !"

When she had spoken, she plunged in her madness
 into the cave ;

Not less swiftly he follows, with feet unswerving and
 brave.

Gods ! whose realm is the spirit-world, mute shadows of might,

Chaos, and Phlegethon¹ thou, broad kingdoms of silence and night,

¹ A river of Hades.

Leave vouchsafe me to tell the tradition, grace to exhume 270

Things in the deep earth hidden and drowned in the hollows of gloom.

So unseen through darkness, amid lone night, they strode

Down the unpeopled realm of Death, and his ghostly abode,

As men journey in woods when a doubtful moon has bestowed

Little of light, when Jove has concealed in shadow
the heaven, 275

When from the world by sombre Night Day's colors are driven.

Facing the porch itself, in the jaws of the gate of the dead,

Grief, and Remorse the Avenger, have built their terrible bed.

There dwells pale-checked Sickness, and Old Age sorrowful-eyed,

Fear, and the temptress Famine, and hideous Want at her side, 280

Grim and tremendous shapes. There Death with Labor is joined,

Sleep, half-brother of Death, and the Joys unclean of the mind.

Murderous Battle is camped on the threshold. Fronting the door

The Iron cells of the Furies, and frenzied Strife,
evermore

Wreathing her serpent tresses with garlands dabbled in gore. 285

Thick with gloom, an enormous elm in the midst of the way
Spreads its time-worn branches and limbs: false
Dreams, we are told,
Make their abode thereunder, and nestle to every spray.
Many and various monsters, withal, wild things to
behold,
Lie in the gateway stabled — the awful Centaurs ¹ of old; 290
Scyllas ² with forms half-human; and there with his hundred hands
Dwells Briareus; ³ and the shapeless Hydra ⁴ of Lerna's lands,
Horribly yelling; in flaming mail the Chimaera ⁵ arrayed;
Gorgons ⁶ and Harpies, ⁷ and one three-bodied and terrible Shade. ⁸

Clasping his sword, Aeneas in sudden panic of fear 295 Points its blade at the legion; and had not the Heaven-taught seer
Warned him the phantoms are thin apparitions, clothed in a vain

¹ Fabled to have been half man, half horse.

² The monster Scylla is usually said to have dwelt in the cave of a rock between Italy and Sicily. Virgil here speaks as if there were several of them, and places them in the lower world.

³ A monstrous giant, one of the sons of Uranus and Gaea.

⁴ The huge water serpent that lived in the marsh of Lerna near Argos.

⁵ A fabulous composite of dragon, lion, and goat.

⁶ Three daughters of Phorcys, whose hair was of snakes and whose looks turned all beholders to stone.

⁷ Mythical monsters, half bird and half woman.

⁸ The giant Geryon.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Over the sea's deep hollows, when winter, chilly and frore,
 Drives them across far waters to land on a sunnier
 shore.

Yonder they stood, each praying for earliest passage, and each
 Eagerly straining his hands in desire of the opposite beach.

Such as he lists to the vessel the boatman gloomy receives, 320
 Far from the sands of the river the rest he chases and leaves.

Moved at the wild uproar, Aeneas, with riveted eyes :
 "Why thus crowd to the water the shadows, priestess?" he cries ;

"What do the spirits desire? And why go some from the shore
 Sadly away, while others are ferried the dark stream o'er?" 325

Briefly the aged priestess again made answer and spake :

"Son of Anchises, sprung most surely from gods
 upon high,

Yon is the deep Cocytus marsh, and the Stygian lake.
 Even the Immortals fear to attest its presence and lie!

These are a multitude helpless, of spirits lacking a grave ; 330

Charon the ferryman ; yonder the buried, crossing the wave.

Over the awful banks and the hoarse-voiced torrents of doom

None may be taken before their bones find rest in a tomb.

Hundreds of years they wander, and flit round river
and shore,

Then to the lake they long for are free to return once more.”

335

Silent the hero gazed and his footstep halted, his mind

Filled with his own sad thoughts and compassion of doom unkind.

Yonder he notes, in affliction, deprived of the dues of
the dead,

Near Leucaspis,¹ Orontes¹ who Lycia's vessels had led.

Over the wind-tossed waters from Troy as together they drave,

340

One wild storm overtook them, engulfing vessels and
brave.

Yonder, behold, Palinurus the pilot gloomily went,

Who, while standing from Libya's shores, on the planets intent,

Fell but of late from the stern, and was lost in a watery waste.

Hardly he knows him at first, as in shadow sadly he paced ;

345

Then at the last breaks silence and cries : “ What God can it be

Robbed us of thee, Palinurus, and drowned thee deep in the sea ?

Answer me thou ! For Apollo I ne'er found false till
to-day ;

Only in this one thing hath his prophecy led us astray.

¹ Former companions of Aeneas.

Safe with life from the deep to Italian shores, we were told, 350
 Thou should'st come at the last! Is it thus that his promises hold?"

"Son of Anchises," he answers, "Apollo's tripod and shrine

Have not lied; no god overwhelmed me thus in the brine.

True to my trust I was holding the helm, stood ruling
 the course,

When by sad misadventure I wrenched it loose, and perforce 355

Trailed it behind in my fall. By the cruel waters I swear

Fear of mine own life truly I knew not, felt but a care

Lest thy bark, of her rudder bereft, and her helmsman lost,

Might be unequal to combat the wild seas round her that tossed.

Three long nights of the winter, across great waters and wide, 360

Violent south winds swept me; at fourth day's dawn
 I descried

Italy's coast, as I rose on the crest of a wave of the sea.

Stroke by stroke I was swimming ashore, seemed nearly to be

Safe from the billows; and weighted by dripping
 garments I clave,

Clutching my hands, to the face of a cliff that towered on the wave, 365

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Many a neighboring people from cities far and unknown,
 Taught by prodigies dire of the skies, thy bones shall atone,
 Building thy tomb, and remitting their gifts each year
 to thy ghost ; 385
 So Palinurus'¹ name shall for ever cleave to the coast."

Thus his affliction she soothes. For a little season his sad
 Spirit has comfort ; he thinks on his namesake land and is glad.

Thence they advance on the journey and now draw near to the flood.

Soon as the boatman saw them, from where on the water he stood, 390

Move through the silent forest and bend their steps to the beach,

Ere they arrive he accosts them, and first breaks silence in speech.

"Stranger, approaching in arms our river, whoever thou art,

Speak on the spot thine errand, and hold thee further apart.

This is the kingdom of shadows, of sleep and the slumberous dark ; 395

Bodies of living men are forbidden the Stygian bark.
 Not of mine own good will was Alcides over the wave
 Yonder, or Theseus taken, nor yet Pirithous brave, Though from gods they descended, and matchless
 warriors were ;

One² from the monarch's presence to chains sought boldly to bear 400

¹ There was a promontory so called.

² Hercules.

Hell's unslumbering warder,¹ and trailed him trembling away.

Two² from her bridal chamber conspired Death's queen to convey."

Briefly again makes answer the great Amphrysian seer:³

"Here no cunning awaits thee as theirs was, far be the fear.

Violence none our weapons prepare; Hell's warder may still 405

Bay in his cavern for ever, affrighting the phantoms chill;

Hell's chaste mistress keep to her kinsman's halls if she will.

Troy's Aeneas, a son most loving, a warrior brave, Goes in the quest of his sire to the deepest gloom of
the grave.

If thou art all unmoved at the sight of a love so true" — 410

Here she displays him the bough in her garment hidden from view —

"Know this branch." In his bosom the tempest of anger abates.

Further he saith not. Feasting his eyes on the wand of the Fates,

Mighty oblation, unseen for unnumbered summers before,

Charon advances his dark-blue bows, and approaches
the shore; 415

¹ Cerberus.

² Theseus and Pirithous.

³ The Sibyl. The epithet "Amphrysian" is applied to her as the priestess of Apollo, who, according to the story, fed the flocks of Admetus near the river Amphrysus in Thessaly.

Summons the rest of the spirits in row on the benches who sate

Place to resign for the comers, his gangway clears,
and on board

Takes Aeneas. The cobbled boat groans under his weight.

Water in streams from the marshes through every fissure is poured.

Priestess and hero safely across Death's river are passed, 420

Land upon mud unsightly, and pale marsh-sedges, at last.

Here huge Cerberus bays with his triple jaws through
the land,

Crouched at enormous length in his cavern facing the strand.

Soon as the Sibyl noted his hair now bristling with snakes,

Morsels she flings him of meal, and of honeyed opiate cakes. 425

Maddened with fury of famine his three great throats
unclose ;

Fiercely he snatches the viand, his monstrous limbs
in repose

Loosens, and, prostrate laid, sprawls measureless over his den.

While the custodian sleeps, Aeneas the entrance takes,
Speeds from the bank of a stream no traveller crosses
again. 430

Voices they heard, and an infinite wailing, as onward
they bore,

Spirits of infants sobbing at Death's immediate door,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Hiding they go, nor in death itself are they eased of the pain.

Phaedra,¹ and Procris,² here, Eriphyle³ here they behold, 450

Sadly displaying the wounds that her wild son wrought her of old.

Yonder Pasiphaë⁴ stood and Evadne;⁵ close to them clung

Laodamia,⁶ and Caenis,⁷ a man once, woman at last,
Now by the wheel of the Fates in her former figure recast.

Fresh from her death-wound still, here Dido,⁸ the others among, 455

Roamed in a spacious wood. Through shadow the chieftain soon

Dimly discerned her face, as a man, when the month is but young,

Sees, or believes he has seen, amid cloudlets shining,
the moon.

Tears in his eyes, he addressed her with tender love
as of old:

¹ Wife of Theseus, who killed herself when her stepson Hippolytus rejected her love.

² Wife of Cephalus, who, moved by jealousy to spy upon her husband, was accidentally killed by him.

³ Killed by her son Alcmaeon, because, bribed with a necklace, she had induced her husband to join the expedition of the Seven against Thebes, in which he was slain.

⁴ Wife of Minos.

⁵ Wife of Capaneus, who threw herself on her husband's funeral pyre and perished.

⁶ Wife of Protesilaus, the first Greek who fell at Troy.

⁷ A girl whom her lover Neptune transformed into a man, but who, on being slain by the Centaurs, was retransformed.

⁸ She had committed suicide after Aeneas' departure from Carthage.

“ True, then, sorrowful Dido, the messenger fires that told

460

Thy sad death, and the doom thou soughtest of choice
by thy hand!

Was it, alas! to a grave that I did thee? Now by the bright

Stars, by the Gods, and the faith that abides in realms of the Night,

'T was unwillingly, lady, I bade farewell to thy land.

Yet, the behest of Immortals, — the same which bids me to go

465

Through these shadows, the wilderness mire and the darkness below, —

Drove me imperious thence, nor possessed I power to believe

I at departing had left thee in grief thus bitter to grieve.

Tarry, and turn not away from a face that on thine
would dwell;

'T is thy lover thou fliest, and this is our last farewell!”

470

So, with a burning heart and with glowering eyes as she went,

Melting vainly in tears, he essayed her wrath to re-
lent;

She with averted gaze upon earth her countenance
cast,

Nothing touched in her look by her lover's words to the last,

474

Set as a marble rock of Marpessus,¹ cold as a stone.

After a little she fled, in the forest hurried to hide,

¹ A mountain in the island of Paros in the Aegaeon Sea.

Ever his foe; Sychaeus¹, her first lord, there at her
 side,
 Answers sorrow with sorrow, and love not less than her own.

Thence on the path appointed they go, and the utter-most plain
 Reach ere long, where rest in seclusion the glorious slain. 480

Tydeus² here he discerns, here Parthenopæus² of old Famous in arms, and the ghost of Adrastus,² pallid and cold.

Wailed in the world of the sunlight long, laid low in the fray,

Here dwell Ilion's chiefs. As his eyes on the gallant array

Lighted, he groaned. Three sons of Antenor yonder they see, 485

Glaucus³ and Medon and young Thersilochus, brethren three;

Here Polyphaetes, servant of Heaven from his earliest breath;

There Idæus, the shield and the reins still holding in death.

Thickly about him gather the spectral children of Troy:

'T is not enough to have seen him, to linger round
 him is joy, 490

Pace at his side, and inquire why thus he descends to
 the dead.

¹ Her husband, after whose murder by her brother Pygmalion she had come from Tyre to Africa, and founded Carthage.

² One of the Seven against Thebes.

³ In this and in the next two lines we have the names of distinguished Trojans who had been killed in the war.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Thou hadst laid thee to die on a heap of the nameless dead.

Yea! and a vacant mound upon far Rhoetaeum's¹
coast

I there built thee, and thrice bade loud farewell to thy ghost. 510

Hallowed the spot by thine armor and name. Ere crossing the wave

Never, friend, could I find thee, nor give thee an Ilian grave."

"Nothing was left undone, O friend!" he replies;
"thou hast paid

All that Deiphobus claims, all debt that was due to his shade.

'T was my destiny sad, and the crime accursed of the Greek 515

Woman,² in woe that plunged me, and wrote this tale
on my cheek.

Well thou knowest — for ah! too long will the memory last —

How Troy's funeral night amid treacherous pleasures
we passed;

When Fate's terrible steed³ overcame our walls at a leap,

Carrying mailclad men in its womb towards Pergama's steep; 520

How, a procession feigning, the Phrygian⁴ mothers
she led

Round our city in orgy, with lighted torch at their head, Waving herself the Achaeans to Ilion's citadel keep.

¹ A promontory north of Troy.

² Helen, who after Paris' death had been given to Deiphobus.

³ The wooden horse.

⁴ Trojan.

I, that night, overburdened with troubles, buried in sleep, 524

Lay in the fatal chamber, delicious slumber and deep Folding mine eyelids, like the unbroken rest of the slain.

She, meanwhile, my glorious spouse, from the palace has ta'en

Every weapon, and drawn from the pillow the falchion I bore,

Then Menelaus¹ summons, and straightway loosens
the door,

Hoping in sooth that her lover with this great boon might be won, 530

Deeming the fame of her guilt in the past might so be undone.

Why on the memory linger? The foe streamed in at the gate

Led by Ulysses, the plotter. May judgment, Immor-tals, wait

Yet on the Greeks, if of vengeance a reverent heart
may be fain!

Tell me in turn what sorrow has brought thee alive and unslain 535

Hither?" he cries; "art come as a mariner lost on the main,

Or by the counsel of Heaven? What fortune drives thee in quest,

Hither, of sunless places and sad, the abodes of unrest?"

Morn already with roseate steeds, while talk they exchange,

Now in her journey has traversed the half of the heavenly range, 540

¹ Brother of Agamemnon and husband of Helen.

And peradventure thus the allotted time had been passed,

Had not the faithful Sibyl rebuked him briefly at last.

“Night draws nigh, Aeneas. In tears we are spending the hours.

Here is the place where the path is divided. This to the right,

Under the walls of the terrible Dis¹ — to Elysium² —
ours. 545

Yonder, the left, brings doom to the guilty, and drives them in flight

Down to the sinful region where awful Tartarus lowers.”

“Terrible priestess, frown not,” Deiphobus cries; “I depart,

Join our shadowy legion, restore me to darkness
anon.

Go, thou joy of the race; may the Fates vouchsafe thee a part 550

Brighter than mine!” And behold, as he uttered the word, he was gone.

Turning his eyes, Aeneas sees broad battlements placed .

Under the cliffs on his left, by a triple rampart encased;

Round them in torrents of ambient fire runs Phlegethon
swift,

River of Hell, and the thundering rocks sends ever adrift. 555

¹ The ruler of the world below, corresponding to the Greek Pluto.

² The abode of the blessed, as Tartarus was the place of punishment for the wicked.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Proud of his idle cunning, till Death brought punishment nigh.

Straightway then the Avenger Tisiphone over them stands,

Scourges the trembling sinners, her fierce lash arming her hands ; 575

Holds in her left uplifted her serpents grim, and from far

Summons the awful troop of her sisters gathered for war !

Then at the last with a grating of hideous hinges unclose

Hell's infernal doors. Dost see what warders are those Crouched in the porch ? What presence is yonder keeping the gate ? 580

Know that a Hydra¹ beyond it, a foe still fiercer in hate,

Lurks with a thousand ravening throats. See ! Tartarus great

Yawning to utter abysses, and deepening into the night,

Twice as profound as the space of the starry Olympian height.

“Here the enormous Titans,² the Earth's old progeny, hurled 585

Low by the lightning, are under the bottomless waters whirled.

Here I beheld thy children, Aloeus, giants³ of might, Brethren bold who endeavored to pluck down heaven from its height,

¹ A water-snake.

² Sons of Uranus and Gaea, who were conquered by Zeus and cast into Tartarus.

³ Otus and Ephialtes.

Fain to displace great Jove from his throne in the kingdom of light.

Saw Salmoneus¹ too, overtaken with agony dire 590
While the Olympian thunder he mimicked and Jove's own fire.

Borne on his four-horsed chariot, and waving torches
that glowed,

Over the Danaan land, through the city of Elis, he rode,

Marching in triumph, and claiming the honors due to a god.

Madman, thinking with trumpets and tramp of the steeds that he drove 595

He might rival the storms, and the matchless thunders of Jove!

But the omnipotent Father a bolt from his cloudy abyss

Launched — no brand from the pine, no smoke of the torchlight this —

And with an awful whirlwind blast hurled Pride to its fall.

Tityos² also, the nursling of Earth, great mother of all, 600

Here was to see, whose body a long league covers of
plain;

One huge vulture, standing with hooked beak at his
side,

Shears his liver that dies not, his bowels fruitful of pain,
Searches his heart for a banquet, beneath his breast
doth abide,

Grants no peace to the vitals that ever renew them
again. 605

¹ Son of Aeolus, who usurped the name and sacrifices of Jupiter.

² Son of Gaea, a giant of Euboea, who was punished for insulting Artemis.

“ Why of Pirithous tell, and Ixion, Lapithae¹ tall, O'er whose brows is suspended a dark crag, ready to fall,

Ever in act to descend? Proud couches raised upon bright

Golden feet are shining, a festal table in sight Laden with royal splendor. The Furies' Queen² on her throne 610

Sits at the banquet by — forbids them to taste it — has flown

Now to prevent them with torch uplifted, and thundering tone.

“ All who have hated a brother in lifetime, all who have laid

Violent hands on a parent, the faith of a client betrayed;

Those who finding a treasure have o'er it brooded alone, 615

Setting aside no portion for kinsmen, a numerous band;

Those in adultery slain, all those who have raised in
the land

Treason's banner, or broken their oath to a master's hand,

Prisoned within are awaiting an awful doom of their own.

“ Ask me not, what their doom, — what form of re-quital or ill 620

Whelms them below. Some roll huge stones to the crest of the hill,

¹ A mythical people of Thessaly, ruled by Pirithous, son of Ixion.

² Either Alecto or Megaera.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Where the divine revelation ordains our gifts to be laid.”

Side by side at her bidding they traverse the region of shade,

Over the distance hasten, and now draw nigh to the doors. 640

Fronting the gates Aeneas stands, fresh water he pours

Over his limbs, and the branch on the portal hangs as she bade.

After the rite is completed, the gift to the goddess addressed,

Now at the last they come to the realms where Joy has her throne ;

Sweet green glades in the Fortunate Forests, abodes of the blest, 645

Fields in an ampler ether, a light more glorious dressed,

Lit evermore with their own bright stars and a sun
of their own.

Some are training their limbs on the wrestling-green,
and compete

Gaily in sport on the yellow arenas, some with their feet

Treading their choral measures, or singing the hymns of the god ; 650

While their Thracian priest,¹ in a sacred robe that trails,

Chants them the air with the seven sweet notes of his musical scales,

Now with his fingers striking, and now with his ivory
rod.

Here are the ancient children of Teucer,¹ fair to behold, Generous heroes, born in the happier summers of
 old, — 655
 Ilus, Assaracus by him, and Dardan, founder of Troy.
 Far in the distance yonder are visible armor and car
 Unsubstantial, in earth their lances are planted, and far
 Over the meadows are ranging the chargers freed from employ.
 All the delight they took when alive in the chariot and sword, 660
 All of the loving care that to shining coursers was paid,
 Follows them now that in quiet below Earth's breast
 they are laid.
 Banqueting here he beholds them to right and to left on the sward,
 Chanting in chorus the Paeon, beneath sweet forests
 of bay,
 Whence, amid wild wood covers, the river Eridanus, poured, 665
 Rolls his majestic torrents to upper earth and the day.
 Chiefs for the land of their sires in the battle wounded
 of yore,
 Priests whose purity lasted until sweet life was no
 more,
 Faithful prophets who spake as beseemed their god
 and his shrine, 669
 All who by arts invented to life have added a grace,

¹ Teucer, Ilus, Assaracus, and Dardan all belonged, in different generations, to the royal house of Troy.

All whose services earned the remembrance deep of the race,
 Round their shadowy foreheads the snow-white garland entwine.

Then, as about them the phantoms stream, breaks silence the seer,
 Turning first to Musaeus,¹ — for round him the shadows appear
 Thickest to crowd, as he towers with his shoulders over the throng — 675

“Tell me, ye joyous spirits, and thou, bright master of song,
 Where is the home and the haunt of the great Au-chises, for whom
 Hither we come, and have traversed the awful rivers of gloom?”

Briefly in turn makes answer the hero: “None has a home
 In fixed haunts. We inhabit the dark thick glades, on the brink 680

Ever of moss-banked rivers, and water meadows that drink
 Living streams. But if onward your heart thus wills ye to go,
 Climb this ridge. I will set ye in pathways easy to know.”

Forward he marches, leading the way; from the heights at the end
 Shows them a shining plain, and the mountain slopes
 they descend. 685

There withdrawn to a valley of green in a fold of the plain

¹ A mythical poet of pre-Homeric times.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

“ Safe upon Tuscan waters the fleet lies. Grant me to grasp
Thy right hand, sweet father, withdraw thee not from its clasp.” 705

So he replied ; and a river of tears flowed over his face.

Thrice with his arms he essayed the beloved one's neck to embrace ;

Thrice clasped vainly, the phantom eluded his hands
in flight,

Thin as the idle breezes, and like some dream of the night.

There Aeneas beholds in a valley withdrawn from the rest 710

Far-off glades, and a forest of boughs that sing in the breeze ;

Near them the Lethe¹ river that glides by abodes of the blest.

Round it numberless races and peoples floating he sees.

So on the flowery meadows in calm, clear summer,
the bees

Settle on bright-hued blossoms, or stream in companies round 715

Fair white lilies, till every plain seems ringing with sound.

Strange to the scene Aeneas, with terror suddenly pale,

Asks of its meaning, and what be the streams in the distant vale,

¹ The river of forgetfulness.

Who those warrior crowds that about yon river await.
Answer returns Anchises: "The spirits promised by Fate

720

Life in the body again. Upon Lethe's watery brink
These of the fountain of rest and of long oblivion
drink.

Ever I yearn to relate thee the tale, display to thine eyes,

Count thee over the children that from my loins shall arise,

So that our joy may be deeper on finding Italy's skies."

725

"O my father! and are there, and must we believe it," he said,

"Spirits that fly once more to the sunlight back from
the dead?

Souls that anew to the body return and the fetters of clay?

Can there be any who long for the light thus blindly
as they?"

"Listen, and I will resolve thee the doubt," Anchises
replies.

730

Then unfolds him in order the tale of the earth and
the skies.

"In the beginning, the earth, and the sky, and the spaces of night,

Also the shining moon, and the sun Titanic and bright
Feed on an inward life, and with all things mingled,
a mind

Moves universal matter, with Nature's frame is combined.

735

Thence man's race, and the beast, and the bird that on pinions flies,
 All wild shapes that are hidden the gleaming waters
 beneath.

Each elemental seed has a fiery force from the skies,
 Each, its heavenly being, that no dull clay can disguise,

Bodies of earth ne'er deaden, nor limbs long destined to death. 740

Hence, their fears and desires; their sorrows and joys; for their sight,

Blind with the gloom of a prison, discerns not the heavenly light.

“Nor when at last life leaves them, do all sad ills, that belong

Unto the sinful body, depart; still many survive Linger within them, alas! for it needs must be that the long 745

Growth should in wondrous fashion at full completion arrive.

So, due vengeance racks them, for deeds of an earlier
 day

Suffering penance, and some to the winds hang view-less and thin

Searched by the breezes; from others, the deep infection of sin

Swirling water washes, or bright fire purges, away. 750

Each in his own sad ghost we endure; then pass to the wide

Realms of Elysium. Few in the fields of the happy abide,

Till great Time, when the cycles have run their courses on high,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Silvius,¹ Alban of name, thy child though born at the end,

Son of thy later years by Lavinia, consort of thine,
Reared in the woods as a monarch and sire of a royal line.

Next to him Procas, the pride of the race; then Capys, and far

Numitor; after him one who again thy name shall revive, 775

Silvius, hight Aeneas, in pious service and war
Noble alike, if to Alba's throne he shall ever arrive.
Heroes fair! how grandly, behold! their manhood is shown,

While their brows are shaded by leaves of the citizen-crown!²

These on the mountain ranges shall set Nomentum³
the steep, 780

Gabii's towers, Fidenae's town, Collatia's keep;
Here plant Innus' camp, there Cora and Bola en-
throne,

Glorious names ere long, now a nameless land and unknown.

Romulus, scion of Mars, at the side of his grandsire⁴ see —

Ilia fair his mother, the blood of Assaracus he! 785

See on his helmet the doubled crest, how his sire has begun

Marking the boy with his own bright plumes for the world of the sun.

¹ In this and the following lines we have the names of princes of Alba.

² A crown of oak leaves was awarded for saving a citizen's life in battle.

³ A town in Old Latium. So, too, the other places mentioned.

⁴ Numitor, the father of Rhea Silvia, or Ilia.

Under his auspices Rome, our glorious Rome, shall
arise,

Earth with her empire ruling, her great soul touching
the skies.

Lo! seven mountains enwalling, a single city, she lies, 790

Blest in her warrior brood! So crowned with towers ye have seen

Ride through Phrygia's cities the great Berecynthian queen,¹

Proud of the gods her children, a hundred sons at her knee,

All of them mighty immortals, and lords of a heavenly fee! 794

Turn thy glance now hither, behold this glorious clan, Romans of thine. See Caesar, and each generation of man

Yet to be born of Iulus beneath heaven's infinite dome.

Yonder behold thy hero, the promised prince, upon whom

Often thy hopes have dwelt, Augustus Caesar, by birth 799

Kin to the godlike dead, who a golden age upon earth Comes to renew where once o'er Latium Saturn reigned,

Holding remote Garamantes and India's tribes en-chained.

Far beyond all our planets the land lies, far beyond high

Heaven, and the sun's own orbit, where Atlas, lifting the sky,

¹ Cybele, the mother of the Gods. Mt. Berecynthus in Phrygia was one of the seats of her worship.

Whirls on his shoulders the sphere, inwrought with its fiery suns! 805
 Ere his arrival, lo! through shivering Caspia¹ runs Fear, at her oracle's answers. The vast Maeotian plain,² Sevenfold Nile and his mouths, are fluttered and tremble again;
 Ranges of earth more wide than Alcides ever surveyed,
 Though he pursued deer brazen of limb, tamed Ery-manth's³ glade, 810
 Lerna⁴ with arrows scared, or the Vinegod,⁵ when from
 the war
 Homeward with ivied reins he conducts his conquering car,
 Driving his team of tigers from Nysa's⁶ summits afar.
 Art thou loth any longer with deeds our sway to expand?
 Can it be fear forbids thee to hold Ausonia's land? 815

“ Who comes yonder the while with the olive branch on his brow,
 Bearing the sacred vessels? I know yon tresses, I know Yon gray beard, Rome's monarch,⁷ the first with law to sustain
 Rome yet young; from the lordship of Cures'⁸ little domain

¹ The country of the Parthians, southeast of the Caspian Sea.

² Maeotis Palus is the ancient name of the Sea of Azof.

³ A mountain chain in the northwest corner of Arcadia, the haunt of the wild boar destroyed by Alcides (Hercules).

⁴ The marsh near Argos where Hercules killed the Hydra.

⁵ Bacchus.

⁶ In India, the scene of Bacchus' nurture.

⁷ Numa Pompilius, the second king of Rome.

⁸ The ancient Sabine town from which Numa came.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Dressed in the shining armor alike, harmonious now While in the world of shadows with dark night over their brow —

Ah! what battles the twain must wage, what legions
array,

What fell carnage kindle, if e'er they reach to the day!

Father¹ descending from Alpine snows and Monoe-cus's² height,

Husband ranging against him an Eastern³ host for the fight! 840

Teach not your hearts, my children, to learn these lessons of strife;

Turn not a country's valor against her veriest life.

Thou be the first to forgive, great child of a heavenly
birth,

Fling down, son of my loins, thy weapons and sword to the earth!

“See, who⁴ rides from a vanquished Corinth in con-queror's car 845

Home to the Capitol, decked with Achaean spoils from
the war!

Argos and proud Mycenae a second⁵ comes to de-
throne,

Ay, and the Aeacus-born,⁶ whose race of Achilles is sown,

¹ Caesar, whose daughter was Pompey's wife.

² The modern Monaco. It is not certain that Caesar entered Italy by this route.

³ Pompey had a large number of Eastern allies.

⁴ The poet reverts to earlier Republican celebrities with a reference to Mummius.

⁵ Aemilius Paulus.

⁶ Perseus, king of Macedonia.

Venging his Trojan sires and Minerva's outraged
fane!

Who would leave thee, Cato, untold? thee, Cossus,
unknown? 850

Gracchus's clan, or the Scipio pair, war's thunder-
bolts twain,

Libya's ruin; — forget Fabricius, prince in his need;
Pass unsung Serranus, his furrows sowing with seed?
Give me but breath, ye Fabians, to follow! Yonder the great

Fabius thou, whose timely delays gave strength to the state. 855

Others will mould their bronzes to breathe with a tenderer grace,

Draw, I doubt not, from marble a vivid life to the face, Plead at the bar more deftly, with sapient wands of the wise

Trace heaven's courses and changes, predict us stars to arise, 859

Thine, O Roman, remember, to reign over every race!
These be thine arts, thy glories, the ways of peace to proclaim,

Mercy to show to the fallen, the proud with battle to tame!"

Thus Anchises, and then — as they marvelled — further anon:

“Lo, where decked in a conqueror's spoils Marcellus,¹ my son,

Strides from the war! How he towers o'er all of the warrior train! 865

When Rome reels with the shock of the wild invaders' alarm,

¹ One of the chief Roman generals in the Second Punic War.

He shall sustain her state. From his war-steed's saddle, dle, his arm
 Carthage and rebel Gaul shall destroy, and the arms of the slain
 Victor a third time hang in his father Quirinus'
 fane."

Then Aeneas, — for near him a youth¹ seemed ever to pace, 870

Fair, of an aspect princely, with armor of glittering grace,

Yet was his forehead joyless, his eye cast down as in grief: —

“Who can it be, my father, that walks at the side of the chief?

Is it his son, or perchance some child of his glorious race

Born from remote generations? And hark, how ringing a cheer 875

Breaks from his comrades round! What a noble presence is here!

Though dark night with her shadow of woe floats over his face!”

Answer again Anchises began with a gathering tear:

“Ask me not, O my son, of thy children's infinite pain!

Fate one glimpse of the boy to the world will grant,
 and again 880

Take him from life. Too puissant methinks to immortals on high

Rome's great children had seemed, if a gift like this from the sky

¹ Young Marcellus, the nephew of Augustus, probably intended by the Emperor to be his successor. He died at the age of twenty.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

So from region to region they roam with curious eyes, Traverse the spacious plains where shadowy darkness
 lies. 901

One by one Anchises unfolds each scene to his son, Kindling his soul with a passion for glories yet to be won.

Speaks of the wars that await him beneath the Italian skies,
 Rude Laurentian¹ clans and the haughty Latinus' walls, 905
 How to avoid each peril, or bear its brunt, as befalls.

Sleep has his portals twain; one fashioned of horn, it is said,

Whence come true apparitions by exit smooth from
 the dead;

One with the polished splendor of shining ivory
 bright,

False are the only visions that issue thence from the
 night. 910

Thither Anchises leads them, exchanging talk by the way,

There speeds Sibyl and son by the ivory gate to the day.

Straight to his vessels and mates Aeneas journeyed, and bore

Thence for Caieta's harbor along the Italian shore.

SIR CHARLES BOWEN.

¹ Laurentum was the chief seat of Latinus, king of Latium.

HORACE

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

WHAT Virgil did for epic poetry, Horace did for lyric. Disregarding everything that Roman precursors in the same field had attempted, he looked to Greek poetry for his models. He even went so far as to speak slightly of Catullus, whose lyrical gift far surpassed his own. His position in literature is unique. Without any very special inspiration, intensity of feeling, or profundity of thought, he produced a body of verse that not only succeeded in winning the interest of his own generation, but has held the attention of all subsequent ages. The real basis of this success is probably the character of the man, with his wide human sympathy, his practical wisdom and knowledge of the world, and his fund of humor and good fellowship, — qualities which find their expression through a medium to which felicity of phrase, unusual skill in handling metrical forms, and the fine sense of appropriateness in figure, word, and theme, which is an attribute of the artist only, give a rare distinction.

He was a freedman's son, born at Venusia, a town on the confines of Apulia, in 65 B. C. Of his education at Rome, which he owed to his father's foresight and self-sacrifice, he himself tells us something in his Satires.

If pure and innocent I live, and dear
To those I love (self-praise is venial here),
All this I owe my father, who, though poor,
Lord of some few lean acres, and no more,
Was loath to send me to the village school,
Whereto the sons of men of mark and rule —

Centurions and the like — were wont to swarm,
 With slate and satchel on sinister arm,
 And the poor dole of scanty pence to pay
 The starveling teacher monthly to the day ;
 But boldly took me when a boy to Rome,
 There to be taught all arts, that grace the home
 Of knight and senator.

He afterwards went to Athens to continue his studies, and he was there at the time of the assassination of Caesar. His sympathies at this period of his life seem to have been strongly Republican, for he joined the forces of Brutus and Cassius, and fought as a military tribune at Philippi. The seventh ode of the second book has a humorous reference to his experience as a soldier. When the war was over he was pardoned, and returned to Rome, where he became one of that coterie of literary men which was known as the Maecenas circle, enjoying the patronage of Augustus' prime minister, and of Augustus himself. Here or at his villa in the Sabine country, which he owed to the generosity of Maecenas, he spent his life, perfectly content with a modest competence and the fame which his writings won him.

His works consist of four books of Odes, the Carmen Saeculare, composed for the celebration of the Secular Games under Augustus, a number of Epodes, two books of Satires, and two books of Epistles. The collection of Odes shows a great variety of subjects. Some of them are love poems written in the mock serious tone which is peculiarly Horatian : for example, the thirteenth of the first book, addressed to Lydia, the sixteenth, to Tyndaris, the nineteenth, to Glycera, the twenty-third, to Chloe, the eighth of the second book, to Barine, the tenth of the third, to Lyce. The length of the list will serve to show that our poet's affections had a wider range than is altogether consistent with even a moderate standard of constancy. A much more serious vein appears in the odes devoted to questions of politics and morals, as the fourteenth of the first book, To the Ship of State, and the noble series at the beginning

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

TO LYDIA

(Odes, I., 8.)

WHY, Lydia, why,
 I pray, by all the gods above,
 Art so resolved that Sybaris should die,
 And all for love?

Why doth he shun
 The Campus Martius' ¹ sultry glare?
 He that once recked of neither dust nor sun,
 Why rides he there,

First of the brave,
 Taming the Gallic steed no more? 10
 Why doth he shrink from Tiber's yellow wave?
 Why thus abhor

The wrestler's oil,
 As 't were from viper's tongue distilled?
 Why do his arms no livid bruises soil, 15
 He, once so skilled,

The disc or dart
 Far, far beyond the mark to hurl,
 And tell me, tell me, in what nook apart,
 Like baby-girl, 20

Lurks the poor boy,
 Veiling his manhood, as did Thetis' son,²
 To 'scape war's bloody clang, while fated Troy
 Was yet undone?

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

¹ The plain by the Tiber, where the Roman youth exercised.

² Achilles, who was disguised as a girl by his mother to prevent his being taken to the Trojan war.

WINTER

(Odes, I., 9.)

SEE, Thaliarch, see, across the plain
 Soracte ¹ white with snow !
 Scarce may the laboring woods sustain
 Their load, and locked in icy chain
 The streams have ceased to flow.

Logs on the fire, your biggest, fling,
 To thaw the pinching cold,
 And from the time to take its sting
 A pipkin forth of Sabine bring,
 Four mellowing summers old.

10

All else unto the Gods leave we ;
 When they have stilled the roar
 Of winds that with the yeasty sea
 Conflict and brawl, the cypress-tree,
 The old ash shake no more.

15

What with to-morrow comes forbear
 To ask, and count as gain
 Each day fate grants, ere time and care
 Have chilled thy blood, and thinned thy hair,
 Love's sweets do not disdain ;

20

Nor, boy, disdain the dance ! For, mark,
 Now is thy time to take
 Joy in the play, the crowded park,
 And those low whispers in the dark,
 Which trysting lovers make.

25

¹ Mt. Soracte, about twenty-five miles north of Rome.

In the sweet laugh, that marks the spot
 Where hid the fair one lies,
 The token from the wrist besought,
 Or from the finger wrung, that not Too cruelly denies.

30

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

TO LEUCONOE

(Odes, I., 11.)

ASK not ('t is forbidden knowledge) what our destined term of year,
 Mine and yours; nor scan the tables of your Baby-lonish seers.
 Better far to bear the future, my Leuconoë, like the past,
 Whether Jove has many winters yet to give, or this our last;
 This, that makes the Tyrrhene billows spend their strength against the shore; 5 Strain your wine, and prove your wisdom; life is short; should hope be more?
 In the moment of our talking, envious time has ebb'd away.
 Seize the present: trust to-morrow e'en as little as you may.

JOHN CONINGTON.

TO THE SHIP OF STATE¹

(Odes, I., 14.)

O SHIP of state,
 Shall new winds bear you back upon the sea?

¹ This ode was written at a time when there seemed to be some possibility of civil war breaking out again.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

INNOCENCE

(Odes, I., 22.)

FUSCUS, the man of life upright and pure,
 Needeth nor javelin, nor bow of Moor,
 Nor arrows tipped with venom deadly-sure,
 Loading his quiver :

Whether o'er Afric's burning sands he rides, 5
 Or frosty Caucasus' bleak mountain-sides,
 Or wanders lonely, where Hydaspes¹ glides,
 That storied river.

For as I strayed along the Sabine wood,
 Singing my Lalage in careless mood, 10
 Lo, all at once a wolf before me stood,
 Then turned and fled :

Creature so huge did warlike Daunia² ne'er
 Engender in her forests' wildest lair,
 Not Juba's³ land, parched nurse of lions, e'er 15
 Such monster bred.

Place me, where no life-laden summer breeze
 Freshens the meads, or murmurs 'mongst the trees,
 Where clouds oppress, and withering tempests freeze
 From shore to shore ; 20

Place me beneath the sunbeams' fiercest glare,
 On arid sands, no dwelling anywhere ;

¹ In India.² Apulia, Horace's native province.³ King of Mauritania in northern Africa.

Still Lalage's sweet smile, sweet voice even there
I will adore.

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

TO CHLOE

(Odes, I., 23.)

YOU fly me, Chloe! like a vagrant fawn,
Tracing the footprints of its parent deer
Through each sequestered path and mazy lawn,
While woods and winds excite a causeless fear.

For should the aspen quiver to the breeze,
Or the green lizards rustle in the brake,
It bounds in vague alarm among the trees,
Its heart-pulse flutters, and its fibres quake.

Yet not as tigers do I follow you,
Or Libyan lion, to destroy your charms; 10
Then cease to linger in a mother's view,
And learn the rapture of a lover's arms.

LORD RAVENSWORTH.

ON THE DEATH OF A FRIEND¹

(Odes, I., 24.)

WHY should we stem the tears that needs must flow,
Why blush, that they should freely flow and long,
To think of that dear head in death laid low?
Do thou inspire my melancholy song,

¹ Quintilius Varus, an intimate friend of Horace and Virgil. The ode is addressed to the latter.

Melpomene,¹ in whom the Muses' sire
 Joined with a liquid voice the mastery of the lyre !

And hath the sleep that knows no waking morn
 Closed o'er Quintilius, our Quintilius dear ?
 Where shall be found the man of woman born
 That in desert might be esteemed his peer, — 10
 Sincere as he, and resolutely just,
 So high of heart, and all so absolute of trust ?

He sinks into his rest, bewept of many,
 And but the good and noble weep for him,
 But dearer cause thou, Virgil, hast than any, 15
 With friendship's tears thy friendless eyes to dim !
 Alas, alas ! Not to such woeful end
 Didst thou unto the gods thy prayers unceasing send !

What though thou modulate the tuneful shell
 With defter skill than Orpheus of old Thrace, 20
 When deftliest he played, and with its spell
 Moved all the listening forest from its place ?
 Yet never, never can thy art avail
 To bring life's glowing tide back to the phantom pale,

Whom with his black inexorable wand, 25
 Hermes,² austere and pitiless as fate,
 Hath forced to join the dark and spectral band
 In their sad journey to the Stygian gate.
 'T is hard, great heavens, how hard ! But to endure Alleviates the pang we may nor crush nor cure ! 30

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

¹ The muse of tragedy.

² It was one of the functions of Hermes to conduct the souls of the dead to the lower world.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

“ Withered leaves strew wintry brooks !
 Ivy garlands greenly darkling,
 Myrtles brown with dewdrops sparkling,
 Best beseem youth’s glowing looks ! ”

30

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

SIMPLICITY

(Odes, I., 38.)

OFF with Persian gear, I hate it,
 Hate the wreaths with limebark bound,
 Care not where the latest roses
 Linger on the ground.

Bring me myrtle, naught but myrtle !
 Myrtle, boy, will well combine
 Thee attending, me carousing,
 ’Neath the trellised vine.

W. E. GLADSTONE.

A WOMAN’S WORD

(Odes, II., 8.)

BARINE ! if some vengeance dread
 Fell on your trebly perjured head,
 Did but a single tooth or nail
 Turn black, I might believe your tale !

But still the oftener that you dare
 To outrage heaven with oaths, more fair
 That face becomes, and, still the more,
 Admirers thicken and adore.

It answers then to treat with scorn ¹
 A parent's ashes, and suborn 10
 The silent stars and heavenly powers,
 To favor falsehood such as yours.

For Venus laughs at woman's wiles ;
 The Graces laugh, and Cupid smiles,
 All as he barbs his glowing darts 15
 On whetstone red with bleeding hearts.

Besides, each day augments your train,
 Each hour new charms your slaves enchain ;
 Nay, even those who late forswore
 Your roof still linger round the door. 20

The mothers for their striplings dread,
 Old men, and virgins lately wed,
 Lest thine alluring air delay
 The bridegroom on his homeward way.

LORD RAVENSWORTH.

THE GOLDEN MEAN

(Odes, II., 10.)

LICINIUS, wouldst thou steer life's wiser voyage,
 Neither launch always into deep mid-waters,
 Nor hug the shores, and, shrinking from the tempest,
 Hazard the quicksand.

He who elects the golden mean of fortune,
 Nor where dull squalor rots the time-worn hovel,
 Nor where fierce envy storms the new-built palace,
 Makes his safe dwelling.

¹ To swear falsely by them.

The wildest winds rock most the loftiest pine-trees,
 The heaviest crash is that of falling towers, 10
 The spots on earth most stricken by the lightning
 Are its high places.

The mind well-trained to cope with either fortune,
 Takes hope in adverse things and fear in prosperous ;
 Deforming winters are restored or banished 15
 By the same Father.

If to-day frown, not therefore frowns to-morrow ;
 His deadly bow not always bends Apollo,
 His hand at times the silent muse awakens
 With the sweet harpstring. 20

In life's sore straits brace and display thy courage ;
 Boldness is wisdom then : as wisely timid
 When thy sails swell with winds too strongly fav'ring,
 Heed, and contract them.
 LORD LYTTON.

A RECONCILIATION

(Odes, III., 9.)

HORACE

WHEN thy fair neck had never felt
 Caress more dear than mine,
 I happier lived than Persia's King,
 For I was thine.

LYDIA

When thy hot heart had never burned
 For Chloe, and was mine,
 I lived more famed than Ilia,¹
 For I was thine.

¹ The mother of Romulus and Remus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Is sprouting all for love and victory
 In vain : his warm red blood, so easily stirred,
 Thy gelid stream shall dye,
 Child of the wanton herd.

Thee the fierce Sirian star,¹ to madness fired, 9
 Forbears to touch : sweet cool thy waters yield,
 To ox with ploughing tired,
 And lazy sheep a-field.

Thou, too, one day shalt win proud eminence
 'Mid honored founts, while I the ilex sing
 Crowning the cavern whence 15
 Thy babbling wavelets spring.

JOHN CONINGTON.

TO MAECENAS

(Odes, III., 29.)

MAECENAS, thou whose lineage springs
 From old Etruria's Kings,
 Come to my humble dwelling.² Haste ;
 A cask unbroached of mellow wine
 Awaits thee, roses interlaced,
 And perfumes pressed from nard divine.
 Leave Tibur³ sparkling with its hundred rills ;
 Forget the sunny slopes of Aesulae,⁴
 And rugged peaks of Telegonian hills⁵
 That frown defiance on the Tuscan sea. 10

¹ The dog-star.

² His Sabine villa.

³ The modern Tivoli, about sixteen miles northeast of Rome.

⁴ Properly Aesula, a Latin town between Tibur and Praeneste.

⁵ It was on a ridge of these mountains that Tusculum, said to have been founded by Telegonus, son of Ulysses, was situated, about ten miles southeast of Rome.

Forego vain pomps, nor gaze around
 From the tall turret of thy palace home
 On crowded marts, and summits temple-crowned,
 The smoke, the tumult, and the wealth of Rome.
 Come, loved Maecenas, come ! 15

How oft in lowly cot
 Uncurtained, nor with Tyrian purple spread,
 Has weary state pillowed its aching head,
 And smoothed its wrinkled brow, all cares forgot ?
 Come to my frugal feast, and share my humble lot.
 For now returning Cepheus¹ shoots again 21

His fires long hid ; now Procyon and the star
 Of the untamed Lion blaze amain :

Now the light vapors in the heated air
 Hang quivering : now the shepherd leads 25
 His panting flock to willow bordered meads
 By river banks, or to those dells
 Remote, profound, where rough Sylvanus² dwells,
 Where by mute margins voiceless waters creep,
 And the hushed Zephyrs sleep. 30

Too long by civil cares opprest
 Snatch one short interval of rest,
 Nor fear lest from the frozen north
 Don's arrowed thousands issue forth,
 Or hordes from realms by Cyrus won, 35
 Or Scythians from the rising sun.

Around the future Jove has cast
 A veil like night : he gives us power

¹ The constellation of which Cepheus formed a part, rose on the 9th of July, Procyon on the 15th of July, and Regulus, the brightest star of the Lion, on the 30th of July.

² The deity who presided over fields and forests.

To see the present and the past,
 But kindly hides the future hour, 40
 And smiles when man with daring eye
 Would pierce that dread futurity.

Wisely and justly guide thy present state,
 Life's daily duty : the dark future flows
 Like some broad river, now in calm repose, 45
 Gliding untroubled to the Tyrrhene Shore,
 Now by fierce floods precipitate,
 And on its frantic bosom bearing
 Homes, herds, and flocks,
 Drowned men, and loosened rocks ; 50
 Uprooted trees from groaning forests tearing ;
 Tossing from peak to peak the sullen waters' roar.

Blest is the man who dares to say,
 " Lord of myself, I 've lived to-day :
 To-morrow let the Thunderer roll 55
 Storm and thick darkness round the pole,
 Or purest sunshine : what is past
 Unchanged for evermore shall last.
 Nor man, nor Jove's resistless sway
 Can blot the record of one vanished day." 60
 Fortune, capricious, faithless, blind,
 With cruel joy her pastime plays,
 Exalts, enriches, and betrays,
 One day to me, anon to others kind.
 I praise her while she stays ; — 65
 But when she shakes her wanton wing
 And soars away, her gifts to earth I fling,
 And wrapped in Virtue's mantle live and die
 Content with dowerless poverty.
 When the tall ship with bending mast

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Nor brib'd with hopes, nor dar'd with awe,
 To servile salutations runs ;
 But either to the clasping vine
 Does the supporting poplar wed,
 Or with his pruning-hook disjoin 20
 Unbearing branches from their head,
 And grafts more happy in their stead :
 Or, climbing to a hilly steep,
 He views his herds in vales afar,
 Or shears his overburden'd sheep, 25
 Or mead for cooling drink prepares,
 Of virgin honey in the jars.
 Or, in the now declining year,
 When bounteous Autumn rears his head,
 He joys to pull the ripen'd pear, 30
 And clust'ring grapes with purple spread.
 The fairest of his fruit he serves,
 Priapus,¹ thy rewards :
 Sylvanus too his part deserves,
 Whose care the fences guards. 35
 Sometimes beneath an ancient oak,
 Or on the matted grass, he lies :
 No god of Sleep he need invoke ;
 The stream, that o'er the pebbles flies,
 With gentle slumber crowns his eyes. 40
 The wind, that whistles through the sprays,
 Maintains the consort of the song ;
 And hidden birds, with native lays,
 The golden sleep prolong.
 But when the blast of winter blows, 45
 And hoary frost inverts the year,
 Into the naked woods he goes,
 And seeks the tusky boar to rear,

¹ A god of the fruitfulness of fields and of cattle.

With well-mouth'd hounds and pointed spear!
 Or spreads his subtle nets from sight, 50
 With twinkling glasses, to betray
 The larks that in the meshes light,
 Or makes the fearful hare his prey.
 Amidst his harmless easy joys
 No anxious care invades his health, 55
 Nor love his peace of mind destroys,
 Nor wicked avarice of wealth.
 But if a chaste and pleasing wife,
 To ease the business of his life,
 Divides with him his household care, 60
 Such as the Sabine matrons were,
 Such as the swift Apulian's bride,
 Sun-burnt and swarthy though she be,
 Will fire for winter nights provide,
 And without noise will oversee 65
 His children and his family ;
 And order all things till he come,
 Sweaty and overlabor'd home ;
 If she in pens his flocks will fold,
 And then produce her dairy store, 70
 With wine to drive away the cold,
 And unbought dainties of the poor ;
 Not oysters of the Lucrine lake ¹
 My sober appetite would wish,
 Nor turbot, or the foreign fish 75
 That rolling tempests overtake,
 And hither waft the costly dish.
 Not heathpout, or the rarer bird,
 Which Phasis ² or Ionia yields,

¹ Properly an inner recess of the Bay of Cumae on the coast of Campania, famous for its oyster beds.

² A river of Colchis, an Asiatic province east of the Black Sea.

More pleasing morsels would afford 80
 Than the fat olives of my fields ;
 Than shards or mallows for the pot,
 That keep the loosen'd body sound,
 Or than the lamb that falls by lot
 To the just guardian ¹ of my ground. 85
 Amidst these feasts of happy swains,
 The jolly shepherd smiles to see
 His flock returning from the plains ;
 The farmer is as pleas'd as he,
 To view his oxen, sweating smoke, 90
 Bear on their necks the loosen'd yoke :
 To look upon his menial crew,
 That sit around his cheerful hearth,
 And bodies spent in toil renew
 With wholesome food and country mirth." 95
 This Morecraft ² said within himself ;
 Resolv'd to leave the wicked town,
 And live retir'd upon his own,
 He call'd his money in ;
 But the prevailing love of pelf 100
 Soon split him on the former shelf,
 He put it out again.

JOHN DRYDEN.

A CHALLENGE

(Epodes, VI.)

WHY snap at the guests who do nobody harm,
 Turning tail at the sight of a wolf ?

¹ Terminus, the god of boundaries.

² Here at the end of the poem comes the surprise that the enthusiastic description of rural life is but the idle dream of a city money-lender.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

“Nay, you should know me: I’m a man of lore.”

“Sir, I’m your humble servant all the more.”

All in a fret to make him let me go, 10

I now walk fast, now loiter and walk slow,

Now whisper to my servant, while the sweat

Ran down so fast, my very feet were wet.

“O had I but a temper worth the name,

Like yours, Bolanus!”¹ inly I exclaim, 15

While he keeps running on at a hand-trot,

About the town, the streets, I know not what.

Finding I made no answer, “Ah! I see,

You’re at a strait to rid yourself of me;

But ’t is no use: I’m a tenacious friend, 20

And mean to hold you till your journey’s end.”

“No need to take you such a round: I go

To visit an acquaintance you don’t know:

Poor man! he’s ailing at his lodging, far

Beyond the bridge where Caesar’s gardens are.” 25

“Oh, never mind: I’ve nothing else to do,

And want a walk, so I’ll step on with you.”

Down go my ears, in donkey-fashion, straight;

You’ve seen them do it, when their load’s too great.

“If I mistake not,” he begins, “you’ll find 30

Viscus² not more, nor Varius, to your mind:

There’s not a man can turn a verse so soon,

Or dance so nimbly when he hears a tune:

While, as for singing — ah! my forte is there:

Tigellius’³ self might envy me, I’ll swear.” 35

He paused for breath: I falteringly strike in:

“Have you a mother? have you kith or kin

¹ Some hot-headed friend of the poet.

² Viscus and Varius were members of the Maecenas circle, into which the speaker was so anxious to be introduced.

³ A well-known musician to whom Julius Caesar and afterwards Augustus showed favor.

To whom your life is precious ? ” “ Not a soul :
 My line ’s extinct : I have interred the whole.”
 O happy they ! (so into thought I fell) 40
 After life’s endless babble they sleep well :
 My turn is next : dispatch me : for the weird
 Has come to pass which I so long have feared,
 The fatal weird a Sabine beldame sung,
 All in my nursery days, when life was young : 45
 “ No sword nor poison e’er shall take him off,
 Nor gout, nor pleurisy, nor racking cough :
 A babbling tongue shall kill him : let him fly
 All talkers, as he wishes not to die.”

We got to Vesta’s temple, and the sun 50
 Told us a quarter of the day was done.
 It chanced he had a suit, and was bound fast
 Either to make appearance or be cast.
 “ Step here a moment, if you love me.” “ Nay ;
 I know no law : ’t would hurt my health to stay, 55
 And then, my call.” “ I ’m doubting what to do,
 Whether to give my lawsuit up or you.”
 “ Me, pray ! ” “ I will not.” On he strides again :
 I follow, unresisting, in his train.

“ How stand you with Maecenas ? ” he began : 60
 “ He picks his friends with care ; a shrewd wise man :
 In fact, I take it, one could hardly name
 A head so cool in life’s exciting game.
 ’T would be a good deed done, if you could throw
 Your servant in his way ; I mean, you know, 65
 Just to play second : in a month, I ’ll swear,
 You ’d make an end of every rival there.”
 “ Oh, you mistake : we don’t live there in league :
 I know no house more sacred from intrigue :
 I ’m never distanced in my friend’s good grace 70
 By wealth or talent : each man finds his place.”

“ A miracle ! if ’t were not told by you,
I scarce should credit it.” “ And yet ’t is true.”

“ Ah, well, you double my desire to rise
To special favor with a man so wise.” 75

“ You ’ve but to wish it : ’t will be your own fault,
If, with your nerve, you win not by assault :
He can be won : that puts him on his guard,
And so the first approach is always hard.”

“ No fear of me, sir : a judicious bribe 80

Will work a wonder with a menial tribe :
Say, I ’m refused admittance for to-day ;
I ’ll watch my time ; I ’ll meet him in the way,

Escort him, dog him. In this world of ours
The path to what we want ne’er runs on flowers.” 85

’Mid all this prate there met us, as it fell,
Aristius, my good friend, who knew him well.

We stop : inquiries and replies go round :

“ Where do you hail from ? ” “ Whither are you bound ? ”

There as he stood, impassive as a clod, 90

I pull at his limp arms, frown, wink, and nod,

To urge him to release me. With a smile

He feigns stupidity : I burn with bile.

“ Something there was you said you wished to tell

To me in private.” “ Ay, I mind it well ; 95

But not just now : ’t is a Jews’ fast to-day :

Affront a sect so touchy ! nay, friend, nay.”

“ Faith, I ’ve no scruples.” “ Ah ! but I ’ve a few :

I ’m weak, you know, and do as others do :

Some other time : excuse me.” Wretched me ! 100

That ever man so black a sun should see !

Off goes the rogue, and leaves me in despair,

Tied to the altar with the knife in air :

When, by rare chance, the plaintiff in the suit

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

My blushes by, and boldly urge my suit.
 If, then, you hold it as a grace, though small,
 To doff one's bashfulness at friendship's call, 20
 Enroll him in your suite, assured you'll find
 A man of heart in him, as well as mind.

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

TO HIS BOOK ¹

(Epistles, I., 20.)

I READ the meaning of that wistful look
 Towards Janus ² and Vertumnus, O my book!
 Upon the Sosii's ³ shelves you long to stand,
 Rubbed smooth with pumice by their skilful hand.
 You chafe at lock and modest seal; you groan,
 That you should only to a few be shown,
 And sigh by all the public to be read,
 You in far other notions trained and bred.
 Well, go your way, whereso you please and when,
 But once sent forth, you come not back again. 29
 "Fool that I was! why did I change my lot?"
 You'll cry, when wounded in some tender spot,
 And, out of fashion and of favor grown,
 You're crumpled up, and into corners thrown.

Unless my ill-divining spirit be 15
 Warped by chagrin at your perversity,
 Thus with sure presage I forecast your doom;
 You will be liked by Rome, while in your bloom,
 But soon as e'er the thumbing and the soil

¹ An epilogue to the first book of the Epistles.

² There were bookshops in the neighborhood of the temple of Janus and of Vertumnus.

³ A prominent firm of booksellers and publishers.

Of vulgar hands shall your first freshness spoil, 20
 You will be left to nibbling worms a prey,
 Or sent as wrappers to lands far away.

Then one, whose warnings on your ears fell dead,
 With a grim smile will note how you have sped,
 Like him who, driven past patience by his mule, 25
 Pushed o'er a precipice the restive fool, —

“Oho! so you're determined to destroy Yourself? Well, do it, and I wish you joy!”

Yet one thing more awaits your failing age;
 That in suburban schools your well-thumbed page 30
 Will be employed by pedagogues to teach
 Young boys with painful pangs the parts of speech.

But if, perchance, some sunny afternoon
 To hear your voice shall eager ears attune,
 Say, that though born a freedman's son, possessed 35
 Of slender means, beyond the parent nest
 I soared on ampler wing; thus what in birth
 I lack, let that be added to my worth.

Say, that in war, and also here at home,
 I stood well with the foremost men of Rome; 40

That small in stature, prematurely grey,
 Sunshine was life to me and gladness; say

Besides, though hasty in my temper, I
 Was just as quick to put my anger by.

Then, should my age be asked you, add that four 45
 And forty years I'd flourished, and no more,

In the December of that year, which fame
 Will join with Lepidus'¹ and Lollius' name.

SIR THEODORE MARTIN.

¹ Lepidus and Lollius were the consuls in B. C. 21.

TIBULLUS

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

FOUR books of Elegies have come down to us under the name of Tibullus, but of these only the first two and a part of the fourth are the work of that poet. Delia, whose real name is said to have been Plania, and Nemesis, whose identity has not been determined, are the central figures of the first and second book respectively. Most of the poems in the fourth book written by him relate to a love affair other than his own, i. e., that of Sulpicia and Cerinthus.

He was born about 54 B. C., probably at Pedum, a town in Latium, where his family, which belonged to the equestrian order, had an estate, apparently of considerable extent. Some part of this, if not all, escaped the confiscations of 41 B. C., and it was throughout his life the poet's favorite retreat. In Rome he was on terms of the greatest intimacy with Valerius Messala, who like Maecenas had surrounded himself with a group of literary men. Yet, while Messala's name occurs frequently in the Elegies, Tibullus' position does not at any time seem to have been one of dependence. Of the friendly relations which existed between him and Horace we know from the latter's works, one of the Odes (I. 33) and one of the Epistles (I. 4) being addressed to him. His death, which took place in 19 B. C., is the subject of the ninth elegy of the third book of Ovid's Amores.

Although of somewhat limited range, and not in any way the work of a poet of the first rank, Tibullus' elegies have an undeniable grace and charm of their own. Free from

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Let me, a simple swain, with honest pride,
 If chance a lambkin from its dam should roam,
 Or sportful kid, the little wanderer chide,
 And in my bosom bear exulting home. 20

Here Pales¹ I bedew with milky showers,
 Lustrations yearly for my shepherd pay,
 Revere² each antique stone bedeck'd with flowers
 That bounds the field, or points the doubtful way.

My grateful fruits, the earliest of the year, 25
 Before the rural god³ shall duly wait.
 From Ceres' gifts I'll cull each browner ear,
 And hang a wheaten wreath before her gate.

The ruddy god⁴ shall save my fruit from stealth,
 And far away each little plunderer scare; 30
 And you, the guardians once of ampler wealth,
 My household gods, shall still my off'rings share.

My numerous herds that wanton'd o'er the mead
 The choicest fatling then could richly yield;
 Now scarce I spare a little lamb to bleed 35
 A mighty victim for my scanty field.

And yet a lamb shall bleed, while, ranged around,
 The village youths shall stand in order meet,
 With rustic hymns, ye gods, your praise resound,
 And future crops and future wines entreat. 40

¹ The tutelary deity of shepherds and cattle.

² In honor of Terminus, the god of boundaries.

³ Silvanus, who presided over woods and fields.

⁴ Statues of Priapus, colored red, were frequently placed in gardens.

Then come, ye powers, nor scorn my frugal board,
Nor yet the gifts clean earthen bowls convey ;
With these the first of men the gods adored,
And form'd their simple shape of ductile clay.

My little flock, ye wolves, ye robbers, spare, 45
Too mean a plunder to deserve your toil ;
For wealthier herds the nightly theft prepare ;
There seek a nobler prey, and richer spoil.

For treasured wealth, nor stores of golden wheat,
The hoard of frugal sires, I vainly call ; 50
A little farm be mine, a cottage neat,
And wonted couch where balmy sleep may fall.

What joy to hear the tempest howl in vain,
And clasp a fearful mistress to my breast ;
Or lull'd to slumber by the beating rain, 55
Secure and happy sink at last to rest.

These joys be mine ! — O grant me only these,
And give to others bags of shining gold,
Whose steely heart can brave the boist'rous seas,
The storm wide-wasting, or the stiff'ning cold. 60

Content with little, I would rather stay
Than spend long months amid the wat'ry waste ;
In cooling shades elude the scorching ray,
Beside some fountain's gliding waters placed.

Oh perish rather all that's rich and rare, 65
The diamond quarry, and the golden vein,
Than that my absence cost one precious tear,
Or give some gentle maid a moment's pain.

With glittering spoils, Messala,¹ gild thy dome,
 Be thine the noble task to lead the brave ; 70
 A lovely foe me captive holds at home,
 Chain'd to her scornful gate, a watchful slave.

Inglorious post ! — and yet I heed not fame :
 Th' applause of crowds for Delia I 'd resign :
 To live with thee I 'd bear the coward's name, 75
 Nor 'midst the scorn of nations once repine.

With thee to live I 'd mock the ploughman's toil,
 Or on some lonely mountain tend my sheep ;
 At night I 'd lay me on the flinty soil,
 And happy 'midst thy dear embraces sleep. 80

What drooping lover heeds the Tyrian² bed,
 While the long night is pass'd with many a sigh ;
 Nor softest down with richest carpets spread,
 Nor whisp'ring rills can close the weeping eye.

Of threefold iron were his rugged frame, 85
 Who, when he might thy yielding heart obtain,
 Could yet attend the calls of empty fame,
 Or follow arms in quest of sordid gain.

Unenvied let him drive the vanquished host,
 Through captive lands his conquering armies lead ;
 Unenvied wear the robe with gold emboss'd, 91
 And guide with solemn state his foaming steed.

Oh may I view thee with life's parting ray,
 And thy dear hand with dying ardor press :

¹ His patron, who was in Asia. Tibullus had been induced to accompany him, but falling ill at Corcyra had returned to Rome.

² Luxurious as those of the people of Tyre.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

For me, while I possess one plenteous year,
I'll wealth and meagre want alike despise.

JAMES GRAINGER.

A RURAL FESTIVAL¹

(II. 1.)

ATTEND! and favor! as our sires ordain,
The fields we lustrate, and the rising grain:
Come, Bacchus, and thy horns with grapes surround;
Come, Ceres, with thy wheaten garland crowned;
This hallow'd day suspend each swain his toil,
Rest let the plough, and rest th' uncultured soil:
Unyoke the steer, his racks heap high with hay,
And deck with wreaths his honest front to-day.
Be all your thoughts to this grand work applied!
And lay, ye thrifty fair, your wool aside! 10
Hence I command you mortals from the rite,
Who spent in amorous blandishment the night,
The vernal powers in chastity delight.
But come, ye pure, in spotless garbs array'd!
For you the solemn festival is made; 15
Come! follow thrice the victim round the lands!
In running water purify your hands!
See to the flames the willing victim come!
Ye swains with olive crown'd, be dumb! be dumb!
"From ills, O sylvan gods, our limits shield, 20
To-day we purge the farmer and the field;
Oh let no weeds destroy the rising grain;
By no fell prowler be the lambkin slain;

¹ The central theme of this elegy is the celebration of the Ambarvalia, which took place annually in April. Its purpose was the purification of the fields.

So shall the hind dread penury no more,
 But gayly smiling o'er his plenteous store, 25
 With liberal hand shall larger billets bring,
 Heap the broad hearth, and hail the genial spring.
 His numerous bond-slaves all in goodly rows,
 With wicker huts your altars shall enclose.
 That done, they 'll cheerly laugh, and dance, and play,
 And praise your goodness in their uncouth lay." 31

The gods assent! see! see! those entrails show
 That heaven approves of what is done below!
 Now quaff Falernian, let my Chian wine,
 Poured from the cask in massy goblets shine! 35
 Drink deep, my friends; all, all, be madly gay,
 'T were irreligion not to reel to-day!
 Health to Messala, every peasant toast,
 And not a letter of his name be lost!

O come, my friend, whom Gallic triumphs¹ grace,
 Thou noblest splendor of an ancient race; 41
 Thou whom the arts all emulously crown,
 Sword of the state, and honor of the gown;
 My theme is gratitude, inspire my lays!
 Oh be my genius! while I strive to praise 45
 The rural deities, the rural plain.
 The use of foodful corn they taught the swain.
 They taught man first the social hut to raise,
 And thatch it o'er with turf, or leafy sprays;
 They first to tame the furious bull essay'd, 50
 And on rude wheels the rolling carriage laid.
 Man left his savage ways; the garden glow'd
 Fruits not their own admiring trees bestow'd,

¹ Messala was given a triumph in 27 B. C. for his victory over the Aquitanians in the battle of Atax.

While through the thirsty ground meandering runnels flowed.

There bees of sweets despoil the breathing spring, 55
And to their cells the dulcet plunder bring.

The ploughman first to soothe the toilsome day
Chanted in measur'd feet his sylvan lay :

And, seed-time o'er, he first in blithesome vein
Piped to his household gods the hymning strain. 60

Then first the press with purple wine o'erran,
And cooling water made it fit for man.

The village lad first made a wreath of flowers
To deck in spring the tutelary powers :

Blest be the country, yearly there the plain 65
Yields, when the dog-star burns, the golden grain :

Thence too thy chorus, Bacchus, first began,
The painted clown first laid the tragic plan.

A goat, the leader of the shaggy throng,
The village sent it, recompensed the song. 70

There too the sheep his woolly treasure wears ;
There too the swain his woolly treasure shears ;

This to the thrifty dame long work supplies ;
The distaff hence, and basket took their rise.

Hence too the various labors of the loom, 75
Thy praise, Minerva,¹ and Arachne's² doom !

'Mid mountain herds, Love first drew vital air,
Unknown to man, and man had nought to fear ;

'Gainst herds, his bow th' unskilful archer drew ;
Ah, my pierced heart, an archer now too true ! 80

Now herds may roam untouch'd, 't is Cupid's joy,
The brave to vanquish, and to fix the coy.

¹ Spinning, weaving, and similar feminine activities were under the patronage of Minerva.

² The story is that Arachne was changed into a spider through the machinations of Athene, who was jealous of her skill in weaving.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

PROPERTIUS

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

OF the life of Propertius, unquestionably the greatest of Roman elegiac poets, very little is known in addition to the few facts that he himself relates. He was an Umbrian, and of the various places which have claimed him, Assisi probably has the strongest case. The year 50 B. C. may be given as an approximate date for his birth. He was a member of the Maecenas circle in Rome, but of all his literary contemporaries Ovid alone mentions him. In none of his poems do we find a reference to any event later than 16 B. C., and with some show of reason his death is generally placed about that time.

Five books of Elegies bear witness to his unusual powers. The first, commonly known as the Cynthia, from the name of the woman who constitutes its principal theme, was published when he was only twenty. It shows extraordinary precocity on the technical as well as on the emotional side. In the second and third books the erotic element is still prominent, but Cynthia is no longer the poet's only thought. In the fourth and fifth books there is greater variety. National themes are introduced, and some poems dealing with the origins of Roman customs and institutions mark the first attempts by a Roman poet in the field of the aetiological elegy.

It is a somewhat disagreeable personality that Propertius' poems reveal. He seems to have been strangely self-centred, gloomy, and morbid. No matter what his theme may be, it is his own relation to it that interests him most, and to himself he almost invariably returns. If his sufferings were great, the contemplation of them afforded him a pleasure that was, in part at least, a recompense. His happiness would seem to have reached its highest point in brooding over his own death and burial.

Unlike that of his contemporary Tibullus his work shows strong Alexandrian influence. His models were Callimachus and Philetas, and it is to his imitation of them that the undue preponderance of mythological lore and the tendency to recondite and abstruse allusion are largely due. To the same source must be ascribed the excessive elaboration of detail and superabundance of ornament that characterize some of his elegies. Yet in spite of these faults we find everywhere traces of a genius of rare brilliancy: imagination of great range and vividness, deftness in word and phrase, and a fine ear for rhythmical effects.

BEAUTY UNADORNED

(I., 2.)

DEAR girl,¹ what boots it thus to dress thy hair,
 Or flaunt in silken garment rich and rare,
 To reek of perfume from a foreign mart,
 And pass thyself for other than thou art —
 Thus Nature's gift of beauty to deface
 And rob thy own fair form of half its grace?
 Trust me, no skill can greater charms impart;
 Love is a naked boy and scorns all art.
 Bears not the sod unbidden blossoms rare?
 The untrained ivy, is it not most fair?
 Greenest the shrub on rocks untended grows,
 Brightest the rill in unhewn channel flows.

10

¹ Cynthia.

The beach is with unpolished pebbles gay,
 And birds untutored trill the sweetest lay.
 Not thus the damsels of the golden age 15
 Were wont the hearts of heroes to engage :
 Their loveliness was to no jewels due,
 But to such tints as once Apelles¹ drew.
 From vain coquettish arts they all were free,
 Content to charm with simple modesty. 20
 By thee despite to me will ne'er be done ;
 The woman pleases well who pleases one.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

TO MAECENAS²

(II., 1.)

YOU ask, why thus my loves I still rehearse,
 Whence the soft strain and ever-melting verse ?
 From Cynthia all that in my numbers shines ;
 She is my genius, she inspires the lines ;
 No Phoebus else, no other Muse I know, 5
 She tunes my easy rhyme, and gives the lay to flow.
 If the loose curls around her forehead play,
 Or lawless, o'er their ivory margin stray :
 If the thin Coan web³ her shape reveal,
 And half disclose those limbs it should conceal ; 10
 Of those loose curls, that ivory front I write ;
 Of the dear web whole volumes I indite :
 Or if to music she the lyre awake,
 That the soft subject of my song I make,
 And sing with what a careless grace she flings 15
 Her artful hand across the sounding strings.

¹ A Greek painter of the Alexandrian period.

² The publication of the first book of his Elegies had won for the poet the favor of Maecenas.

³ Of silk from the island of Coos.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

And there th' ensanguined wave of Sicily,¹
 And sceptred Alexandria's² captive shore, 45
 And sad Philippi,³ red with Roman gore :
 Then, while the vaulted skies loud Ios⁴ rend,
 In golden chains should loaded monarchs bend,
 And hoary Nile with pensive aspect seem
 To mourn the glories of his sevenfold stream, 50
 While prows,⁵ that late in fierce encounter met,
 Move through the Sacred Way and vainly threat,
 Thee too the Muse should consecrate to fame,
 And with her garlands weave thy ever-faithful name.

But nor Callimachus'⁶ enervate strain 55
 May tell of Jove, and Phlegra's⁷ blasted plain ;
 Nor I with unaccustom'd vigor trace
 Back to its source divine the Julian race.
 Sailors to tell of winds and seas delight,
 The shepherd of his flocks, the soldier of the fight, 60
 A milder warfare I in verse display ;
 Each in his proper art should waste the day :
 Nor thou my gentle calling disapprove,
 To die is glorious in the bonds of love.

Happy the youth, and not unknown to fame, 65
 Whose heart has never felt a second flame.
 Oh, might that envied happiness be mine !

¹ Sextus Pompeius had been defeated in a number of naval battles near Sicily.

² Alexandria was taken in B. C. 30.

³ In Macedonia, the scene of the victory of Antony and Octavian over Brutus and Cassius in 42 B. C.

⁴ "Io!" was a cry of triumph.

⁵ When a naval victory was celebrated, the beaks of ships were sometimes borne in the triumphal procession.

⁶ The famous Alexandrian poet who flourished about 260 B. C.

⁷ Perhaps the volcanic plain along the coast of Campania in the neighborhood of Cumae. It was said to have been the battleground of the gods and the giants.

To Cynthia all my wishes I confine ;
 Or if, alas ! it be my fate to try
 Another love, the quicker let me die : 70
 But she, the mistress of my faithful breast,
 Has oft the charms of constancy confessed,
 Condemns her fickle sex's fond mistake,
 And hates the tale of Troy for Helen's sake.
 Me from myself the soft enchantress stole ; 75
 Ah ! let her ever my desires control,
 Or if I fall the victim of her scorn,
 From her loved door may my pale corse be borne.
 The power of herbs can other harms remove,
 And find a cure for every ill but love. 80
 The Malian's ¹ hurt Machaon could repair,
 Heal the slow chief, and send again to war ;
 To Chiron ² Phoenix ³ owed his long-lost sight,
 And Phoebus' son ⁴ recall'd Androgeos to the light.
 Here arts are vain, e'en magic here must fail, 85
 The powerful mixture and the midnight spell ;
 The hand that can my captive heart release,
 And to this bosom give its wonted peace,
 May the long thirst of Tantalus ⁵ allay,
 Or drive th' infernal vulture from his prey.⁶ 90

¹ Philoctetes of Malis, a district in the south of Thessaly. Bitten by a snake on the way to Troy, he had been abandoned at Lemnos, but in the tenth year of the war he was healed by Machaon, son of Aesculapius, and joined the Greeks once more at Troy. It was he who killed Paris.

² The centaur who was entrusted with the education of Achilles.

³ The friend of Achilles.

⁴ Aesculapius, who brought back to life Androgeos, son of Minos of Crete.

⁵ Afflicted with perpetual thirst in the lower world for revealing the secrets of Jove.

⁶ Prometheus, who for stealing fire from heaven was fastened to one of the cliffs of Mt. Caucasus, where a vulture preyed upon his liver.

For ills unseen what remedy is found?
 Or who can probe the undiscover'd wound?
 The bed avails not, nor the leech's care,
 Nor changing skies can hurt, nor sultry air.
 'T is hard th' elusive symptoms to explore; 95
 To-day the lover walks, to-morrow is no more;
 A train of mourning friends attend his pall,
 And wonder at the sudden funeral.

When then my fates that breath they gave shall claim,
 And the short marble but preserve a name, 100
 A little verse my all that shall remain,
 Thy passing courser's slacken'd speed restrain,
 (Thou envied honor of thy poet's days,
 Of all our youth th' ambition and the praise!)
 Then to my quiet urn awhile draw near, 105
 And say, while o'er the place you drop a tear,
 "Love and the fair were of his life the pride;
 He lived, while she was kind; and when she frown'd,
 he died."

THOMAS GRAY.

A CHANGE OF VIEW

(III., 5, 19 seq.)

LONG as of youth the joyous hours remain,
 Me may Castalia's¹ sweet recess detain,
 Fast by th' umbrageous vale lull'd to repose,
 Where Aganippe² warbles as it flows;
 Or roused by sprightly sounds from out the trance, 5
 I'd in the ring knit hands, and join the Muses' dance.

¹ A spring on Mt. Parnassus sacred to Apollo and the Muses.

² A spring on Mt. Helicon in Boeotia.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Who measured out the year and bade the seasons
roll;

If realms beneath those fabled torments know,
Pangs without respite, fires that ever glow, 40
Earth's monster brood ¹ stretch'd on their iron bed,
The hissing terrors round Alecto's ² head,
Scarce to nine acres Tityus' bulk confined,
The triple dog that scares the shadowy kind,
All angry heaven inflicts, or hell can feel, 45
The pendent rock, Ixion's whirling wheel,
Famine at feasts, and thirst amid the stream;
Or are our fears th' enthusiast's empty dream,
And all the scenes, that hurt the grave's repose,
But pictured horror and poetic woes. 50

These soft inglorious joys my hours engage;
Be love my youth's pursuit, and science crown my age.

You, whose young bosoms feel a nobler flame,
Redeem what Crassus ³ lost, and vindicate his name.

THOMAS GRAY.

A ROMAN MATRON TO HER HUSBAND ⁴

(V., 11.)

WEEP no more, Paullus, where thy wife is laid:
At the dark gate thy prayer will beat in vain;

¹ The giants, sons of Earth, who rebelled against Jove.

² One of the Furies.

³ Crassus had been defeated by the Parthians in a disastrous battle in 55 B. C.

⁴ One of the most famous of Propertius's elegies. Cornelia is represented as addressing her husband from the tomb. She was the daughter of Publius Cornelius Scipio by Scribonia, who was afterwards the wife of Augustus. Her husband was Paullus Aemilius Lepidus, consul in B. C. 34.

Once let the nether realm receive the shade,
The adamantine bar turns not again.

Prayer may move heaven, but, the sad river passed, 5
The grave relentless gives not back its dead:
Such sentence spake the funeral trumpet's blast,
As sank in funeral flames thy loved one's head.

No honors that on Paullus' consort wait,
No pride of ancestry or storied bust, 10
Could save Cornelia from her cruel fate:
Now one small hand may hold her grandeur's dust.

Shades of the Dead and sluggish fens that gloom
Around Hell's murky shores my steps to bind,
Before my hour, but pure in soul, I come, 15
Then let the Judge of all the Dead be kind.

Call the dread court: let silence reign in Hell;
Set for an hour the damned from torture free,
And still the Guardian Hound. If aught I tell
But truth, fall Hell's worst penalty on me. 20

Is honor to a glorious lineage due?
What my sires were, Afric and Spain proclaim;
Nor poor the blood I from my mother drew,
For well may Libo's match with Scipio's name.

And when, my virgin vesture laid aside, 25
They placed the matron's wreath upon my head,
Thine, Paullus, I became, till death thy bride:
"Wedded to one" shall on my tomb be read.

By glory's shrine I swear, great Scipio's tomb,
Where sculptured Afric sits a captive maid, 30

By him ¹ that led the Macedonian home
 In chains and all his pride in ruin laid,

Never for me was bent the censor's law ;
 Never by me wrong to your honor done ;
 Your scutcheon to Cornelia owes no flaw, 35
 To her your roll of worthy names owes one.

Nor failed my virtue ; faithful still I stood,
 And stainless from the bridal to the bier.
 No law I needed save my noble blood ;
 The basely born are innocent through fear. 40

Judge strictly as ye will, within the bound
 Of Death's wide realm not one, matron or maid,
 Howe'er renowned in story, will be found
 To shun communion with Cornelia's shade.

Not she, the wife of purity unstained, 45
 At touch of whose pure hand Cybele moved,²
 When hands less pure in vain the cable strained,
 Not she,³ the virgin of the gods beloved,

For whom, when Vesta's sacred fire was lost,
 It from her votary's robe rekindled sprang. 50
 And thou, dear mother, did thy child e'er cost
 Thee, save by her untimely fate, a pang ?

Short was my span, yet children three I bore,
 And in their arms I drew my latest breath ;

¹ Aemilius Paullus, who conquered Perseus in 168 B. C. His son became a Scipio by adoption.

² The ship that was bearing the image of Cybele to Rome ran aground in the Tiber, and it was only when the vestal Claudia laid her hand upon the cable that it could be moved.

³ The vestal Aemilia.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Learn, children, to forestall your sire's decline,
And let no lonesome thought come near his life ;
Add to your years what Fate has reft from mine ;
Blest in my children let him bless his wife.

Though brief my day, I have not lived in vain ; 85
Mourning for child of mine I never wore ;
When from my home went forth my funeral train,
Not one was missing there of all I bore.

My cause is pleaded. Now, ye mourners rise
And witness bear till earth my meed decree ; 90
If worth may claim its guerdon in the skies,
My glorious ancestors may welcome me.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

OVID

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

AT the end of the fourth book of the Tristia, Ovid, following a custom of Roman elegiac poets, has given a sketch of his life. He was born in 43 B. C., at Sulmo, a town of the Pelignians, about seventy miles east of Rome. His father, who belonged to the equestrian order, destined him for a legal and political career, and with this end in view sent him to Rome and afterwards to Athens to study under some of the distinguished rhetoricians of the day. His own inclinations, however, were towards literature rather than law, and when he was about twenty-four he abandoned his legal pursuits to devote himself entirely to poetry. The Amores made him famous as a writer of erotic elegies, and this success was followed up by the publication of the Heroides, a series of imaginary letters in elegiac verse from deserted women to their erring lovers, and the pseudo-didactic poem on the Art of Love. Later came the Metamorphoses, a collection of mythological stories in fifteen books, written in hexameters, and the Fasti, a poetical calendar of the first six months of the year. He was at the height of prosperity when in 8 A. D. he was struck down by a decree of Augustus which banished him to Tomi, a desolate place on the shores of the Black Sea. The cause of his banishment has never been accurately determined, but the conjecture that he had been in some way implicated in the intrigue of Julia, the notorious granddaughter of Augustus, with Decimus Silanus, has a fair degree of probability. The sentence was never remitted, and he died at Tomi in 18 A. D. To the period of his exile belong the Epistolae ex Ponto, the Tristia, and other miscellaneous poems.

While Propertius puzzles us by his curious self-absorption, Ovid amazes us by his cleverness, his quickness, his versatility, and his astounding facility in metrical composition. The Metamorphoses constitute one of the most remarkable tours de force in literary history. They show, successfully combined in one whole, a bewildering array of myths that have as their only common theme some kind of change of form. Fable is linked to fable, myth to myth, with a nicety of juncture that never fails, a variety of device that seems to be inexhaustible. In the stories themselves we find all the qualities of the literary artist whose natural gifts have been supplemented by training and practice: verve in narration, picturesqueness in description, skill in the elaboration of simile or metaphor, and the faculty of writing in smoothly flowing verse that knows no pause. Swift, vivid, brilliant, never wearying us except by the infinity of his surprises, coercing our admiration of his storyteller's art, he carries us along through his strange world of ever changing forms that begin with Deucalion and end with Julius Caesar. In the Fasti, with their explanations of the festivals of the different months, we see the same characteristics, but added to them something more serious, an aetiological spirit that makes them the most substantial of all the poet's works. His erotic elegies and his Art of Love, written to amuse himself and others as flippant as himself, show him to have been, in some moods at least, frivolous to the last degree of frivolity, careless of himself and of the society in which he moved, such a man as could only have been produced by an age in which the old republican virtue and simplicity had given way to luxury and even immorality.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

If such a town and subjects you could see,
 Still would you want a wife who loved like me.
 For oh! I burn, like fires with incense bright; 25
 Not holy tapers flame with purer light.
 Aeneas is my thoughts' perpetual theme,
 Their daily longing, and their nightly dream.
 Yet he's ungrateful and obdurate still;
 Fool that I am to place my heart so ill! 30
 Myself I cannot to myself restore;
 Still I complain, and still I love him more.
 Have pity, Cupid, on my bleeding heart,
 And pierce thy brother's¹ with an equal dart.
 I rave, nor canst thou Venus' offspring be, 35
 Love's mother could not bear a son like thee.
 From hardened oak, or from a rock's cold womb,
 At least thou art from some fierce tigress come;
 Or on rough seas, from their foundation torn,
 Got by the winds, and in a tempest born: 40
 Like that, which now thy trembling sailors fear;
 Like that, whose rage should still detain thee here.
 Behold how high the foamy billows ride!
 The winds and waves are on the juster side.
 To winter weather, and a stormy sea, 45
 I'll owe what rather I would owe to thee.
 Death thou deserv'st from heaven's avenging laws;
 But I'm unwilling to become the cause.
 To shun my love, if thou wilt seek thy fate,
 'Tis a dear purchase, and a costly hate. 50
 Stay but a little, till the tempest cease,
 And the loud winds are lulled into a peace.
 May all thy rage, like theirs, inconstant prove!
 And so it will if there be power in love.
 Know'st thou not yet what dangers ships sustain? 55

¹ Aeneas was a son of Venus and so is called a brother of Cupid.

So often wrecked, how darest thou tempt the main ?
 Which were it smooth, were every wave asleep,
 Ten thousand forms of death are in the deep.
 In that abyss the gods their vengeance store,
 For broken vows of those who falsely swore ; 60
 There winged storms on sea-born Venus wait,
 To vindicate the justice of her state.
 Thus I to thee the means of safety show ;
 And, lost myself, would still preserve my foe.
 False as thou art, I not thy death design ; 65
 O rather live, to be the cause of mine !
 Should some avenging storm thy vessel tear,
 (But heaven forbid my words should omen bear !)
 Then in thy face thy perjured vows would fly,
 And my wronged ghost be present to thy eye ; 70
 With threatening looks think thou behold'st me stare,
 Gasping my mouth, and clotted all my hair.
 Then, should forked lightning and red thunder fall,
 What couldst thou say, but, " I deserved them all " ?
 Lest this should happen, make not haste away ; 75
 To shun the danger will be worth thy stay.
 Have pity on thy son,¹ if not on me ;
 My death alone is guilt enough for thee.
 What has his youth, what have thy gods deserved,
 To sink in seas, who were from fires preserved ? 80
 But neither gods nor parent didst thou bear ;
 Smooth stories all, to please a woman's ear,
 False as the tale of thy romantic life.
 Nor yet am I thy first-deluded wife ;
 Left to pursuing foes Creüsa² stayed, 85
 By thee, base man, forsaken and betrayed.

¹ Ascanius, who accompanied his father from Troy.

² Aeneas's Trojan wife. Dido accuses him of having left her behind intentionally when he fled from Troy.

This, when thou told'st me, struck my tender heart,
 That such requital followed such desert.
 Nor doubt I but the Gods, for crimes like these,
 Seven winters ¹ kept thee wandering on the seas, 90
 Thy starved companions, cast ashore, I fed,
 Thyself admitted to my crown and bed.
 To harbor strangers, succor the distressed
 Was kind enough ; but, oh, too kind the rest !
 Curst be the cave which first my ruin brought, 95
 Where, from the storm, we common shelter sought !
 A dreadful howling echoed round the place ;
 The mountain nymphs, thought I, my nuptial grace.
 I thought so then, but now too late I know
 The furies yelled my funerals from below. 100
 O chastity and violated fame,
 Exact your dues to my dead husband's ² name !
 By death redeem my reputation lost,
 And to his arms restore my guilty ghost !
 Close by my palace, in a gloomy grove, 105
 Is raised a chapel to my murdered love ;
 There, wreathed with boughs and wool, his statue stands,
 The pious monument of artful hands.
 Last night, methought, he called me from the dome,
 And thrice, with hollow voice, cried, " Dido, come ! "
 She comes ; thy wife thy lawful summons hears, 111
 But comes more slowly, clogged with conscious fears.
 Forgive the wrong I offered to thy bed ;
 Strong were his charms, who my weak faith misled.
 His goddess mother, and his aged sire ³ 115
 Borne on his back, did to my fall conspire.

¹ Seven years had passed since the fall of Troy.

² Sychaeus, after whose murder by her brother Pygmalion, king of Tyre, Dido had fled to Africa and founded Carthage.

³ Aeneas had told her how he saved his father Anchises on the night of the sack of Troy.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Some god, thou sayest, thy voyage does command ;
 Would the same god had barred thee from my land !
 The same, I doubt not, thy departure steers, 155
 Who kept thee out at sea so many years ;
 While thy long labors were a price so great,
 As thou, to purchase Troy, wouldst not repeat.
 But Tiber¹ now thou seek'st, to be at best,
 When there arrived, a poor precarious guest. 160
 Yet it deludes thy search ; perhaps it will
 To thy old age lie undiscovered still.

A ready crown and wealth in dower I bring,
 And, without conquering, here thou art a king.
 Here thou to Carthage may'st transfer thy Troy ; 165
 Here young Ascanius may his arms employ ;
 And, while we live secure in soft repose,
 Bring many laurels home from conquered foes.

By Cupid's arrows, I adjure thee stay !
 By all the gods, companions of thy way ! 170
 So may the Trojans, who are yet alive,
 Live still, and with no future fortune strive ;
 So may thy youthful son old age attain,
 And thy dead father's bones in peace remain ;
 As thou hast pity on unhappy me, 175
 Who knew no crime, but too much love of thee.
 I am not born from fierce Achilles' line,
 Nor did my parents against Troy combine.
 To be thy wife if I unworthy prove,
 By some inferior name admit my love. 180
 To be secured of still possessing thee,
 What would I do, and what would I not be !

Our Libyan coasts their certain seasons know,
 When, free from tempests, passengers may go ;

¹ Latium was the Trojans' promised land.

But now with northern blasts the billows roar, 185
 And drive the floating sea-weed to the shore.
 Leave to my care the time to sail away ;
 When safe, I will not suffer thee to stay.
 Thy weary men would be with ease content ;
 Their sails are tattered, and their masts are spent. 190
 If by no merit I thy mind can move,
 What thou deniest my merit, give my love.
 Stay, till I learn my loss to undergo,
 And give me time to struggle with my woe :
 If not, know this, I will not suffer long ; 195
 My life 's too loathsome, and my love too strong.
 Death holds my pen, and dictates what I say,
 While cross my lap the Trojan sword I lay.
 My tears flow down ; the sharp edge cuts their flood,
 And drinks my sorrows, that must drink my blood. 200
 How well thy gift¹ does with my fate agree !
 My funeral pomp is cheaply made by thee.
 To no new wounds my bosom I display ;
 The sword but enters where love made the way.
 But thou, dear sister,² and yet dearer friend, 205
 Shalt my cold ashes to their urn attend.
 Sychaeus' wife let not the marble boast ;
 I lost that title, when my fame I lost.
 This short inscription only let it bear ;
 " Unhappy Dido lies in quiet here. 210
 The cause of death, and sword by which she died,
 Aeneas gave ; the rest her arm supplied."

ALEXANDER POPE.

¹ The sword. According to Virgil's story (Aeneid, IV.), Dido had given it as a present to Aeneas, and he had accidentally left it behind.

² Anna, who had been her confidante throughout the affair with Aeneas.

PHAËTHON

(Metamorphoses II., 1-366.)

SUBLIME on lofty columns, bright with gold
 And fiery carbuncle, its roof inlaid
 With ivory, rose the Palace of the Sun,
 Approached by folding gates with silver sheen
 Radiant; material priceless, — yet less prized
 For its own worth than what the cunning hand
 Of Mulciber¹ thereon had wrought, — the globe
 Of Earth, — the Seas that wash it round, — the Skies
 That overhang it. 'Mid the waters played
 Their Gods caerulean. Triton² with his horn 10
 Was there, and Proteus³ of the shifting shape,
 And old Aegeon,⁴ curbing with firm hand
 The monsters of the deep. Her Nereids there
 Round Doris⁵ sported, seeming, some to swim,
 Some on the rocks their tresses green to dry, 15
 Some dolphin-borne to ride; nor all in face
 The same, nor different; — so should sisters be.
 Earth showed her men, and towns, and woods, and beasts,
 And streams, and Nymphs, and rural Deities:
 And over all the mimic Heaven was bright 20
 With the twelve Zodiac signs, on either valve
 Of the great portal figured, — six on each.

¹ Vulcan in his function as a smith.

² A son of Neptune, generally represented as blowing on a twisted sea-shell to raise or calm the waves.

³ The keeper of Neptune's flocks (the seals). He had the power of changing his shape at will.

⁴ Here represented as a god of the sea.

⁵ A daughter of ocean, wife of Nereus, and mother of the Nereides, nymphs of the sea.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

He said, "thy mother's tale was truth. To still
 All question, ask what boon thou wilt: — ere asked
 I grant it thee. By Styx, dread oath of Gods,
 Which never yet these rays illumed, I swear!" 55
 Scarce uttered was the promise, when the youth
 Demands his father's car, and, for one day,
 The rein and guidance of its winged steeds.
 Then rued the God his oath, and thrice and once
 Shaking his radiant head, "Alas! thy speech 60 Proves mine too rash!" he cried, — "would yet my boon

I could deny, for thou the one sole thing
 Hast asked I would not grant thee. O my son,
 Let me dissuade, if not refuse. Thy wish
 Is fraught with peril! 'Tis no little thing 65
 Thou seek'st, my Phaëthon! a trust for heads
 And years like thine unfitting. Mortal, thou Immortal function dar'st affect, and more Than all Heaven's Gods may venture. Whatsoe'er
 His confidence, none save myself can guide 70
 That fiery chariot, task for Jove himself,
 Whose terrible right hand the thunder wields,
 Too hard, — and where is greater strength than Jove's?

Steep is the track at starting, even for steeds
 Fresh with the morn no easy climb: — then lies 75
 High across central Heaven, whence I, — even I, —
 On Earth and Sea not without fear look down:
 Then sheer again descends, — sure hand and strong
 Demanding, where old Tethys'¹ self, whose waves
 Beneath receive me, dreads some day to see 80
 My headlong fall. Add, that the heavens, around
 In ceaseless revolution borne, attract

¹ The wife of Ocean.

And with them drag in dizzy whirl the stars.
 Adverse to these my course. All else they sweep
 With them, — save me. Against the rapid rush 85
 Of the World I hold my way. But thou — suppose
 The chariot thine — couldst thou unswerving keep
 The path 'twixt either Pole, or stem undazed
 The whirl of Heaven? Dost dream that journey winds

By groves, and towns, and fanes of Gods with gifts 90
 Resplendent? Through what perils, 'mid what forms
 Of monsters lies it! Shouldst thou keep the track
 Perchance, nor deviate aught, still must thou tempt
 The horns of hostile Taurus, and the shafts
 Of that Thessalian archer, Leo's jaws 95
 Terrific, Scorpio's cruel arms around
 Groping for prey, and Cancer's claw which grasps
 With backward clutch its spoil! Nor light the task
 That team to curb, impetuous, breathing flame From mouth and nostril! Scarce, when warmed, they bear 100

My hand, and toss with scornful neck the rein!
 Bethink thee, O my son, nor let thy sire
 With fatal gift undo thee! While thou mayst,
 Amend thy suit. Thou wouldst by certain proof
 Assure thy parentage. My grief supplies 105
 The pledge; — my father's fears the father prove.
 Look on me! Would thy glance my inmost heart
 Could penetrate, and read the sire within!
 Oh! ransack all the treasures of the world,
 Earth, sea, and sky, — choose what thou wilt of all 110
 Their gifts, nor dread denial! This alone
 Forbear to seek, — false honor, — certain bane!
 The boon thou seekest is thy doom, my son!
 Nay, clasp not thus my neck — ah! rash and blind!

Whate'er thy wish, doubt not, 't is thine, for Styx 115
Hath heard my oath, — but oh, more wisely ask!"

He ended, but the youth his warning scorned,
And urged his boon, and burned to guide the car,
Whereto at length the sire, with what delay
He could, unwilling led him. Vulcan wrought 120
The chariot; — gold its axle was, its pole
Golden, its wheels gold-tired, with silver spokes:
And from its seat unnumbered chrysolites
Flashed back reflected light. The daring boy
Admiring scans the marvel. And now wide 125
Aurora, blushing-born, her purple gate,
Wakeful, had flung, and all her roseate halls
Disclosed; and Lucifer the gathered stars
Drove homeward, last himself to leave the skies.
And Phoebus, as he saw the rosy flush 130
Suffuse the world, and Luna's horns in light
Superior vanish, bade the rapid Hours
Yoke to the car the steeds. The Hours obey
Instant, and from their stalls the coursers lead,
With juice ambrosial nourished, and attach 135
The harness resonant. With drugs of power
The Sire anoints his offspring's brow, to bear
Unharm'd the flames, and round his tresses binds
The radiant crown, and, with deep sighs, too well
Prescient of coming sorrow, speaks: "O son! — 140
If thus much of thy father's warning thou
Canst follow, — spare the lash, and tightly hold
The rein. My steeds spontaneous fly: thy task
Will be to check them. Nor directly urge
Through the five zones thy way. A path oblique 145
Winds curving through the central three. Content
With these, and shunning either Pole, the track
Observe, where erst my wheels have marked the road,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Too sparely ballasted, across the deep
 Unsteady drives, the chariot now, unpressed
 By its due burden, reels and rocks, and seems
 As empty to those coursers, quick to snatch
 Their liberty. Wild dashing on, they quit 185
 The beaten track, and all control disown.
 Cold tremors seize the youth : — no more he knows
 Which rein to try, or where his road, though vain
 'T were now, when all command is lost, to know.
 Now first those heavenly Oxen burned with heat 190
 Unfelt before, and vainly longed to plunge
 Beneath the wave denied them ; — and the Snake
 Nighest the icy Pole, till now with cold
 Inert, and terrible to none, conceived
 Strange fury from the rays. Even thou, they say, 195
 Alarmed didst fly, Boötes, slow albeit
 Of movement by thy tardy wain delayed.
 But when the hapless Phaëthon looked down
 From Heaven to Earth, so wide, so far below,
 Together knocked his knees, and blanched his cheeks,
 And darkness, born of too much light, his eyes 201
 Confounded. Would his hand had ne'er essayed
 Those steeds to rule ! Ah, would he ne'er had won
 With fatal prayer this proof of heavenly birth,
 Content with Merops for a sire ! As drives 205
 Some bark, when Boreas rages, and the helm
 The o'ermastered pilot quits, nor hope has more,
 Save in his prayers and Gods — so headlong now
 The youth is borne. Behind him spreads the track
 Of Heaven already passed — before him lies 210
 A wider yet ! Both measuring, now with look Strained to that west he ne'er is doomed to reach —
 Now eastward — paralyzed in blank despair
 He stands — the loose reins idle in his hands

Which neither drop nor manage them — nor knows
By name to call and pacify his steeds. 216

A place there is in Heaven where Scorpio curves
In double bow his arms, and, with spread tail
And claws on either side outstretched, usurps
Space ample for two signs. When him the Boy 220
Beheld, black venom sweltering, and with sting
Exasperate threatening wounds and death, — all heart
Failed him, and icy terror numbed his hands,
And from them shook the reins ; no sooner felt Loose floating on those coursers' backs, than wild 225
They swerve, and masterless through unknown realms
Of air, as impulse urges, bound, and dash
Against fixed orbs of stars, and whirl the car
Through space by track unmarked, and now aloft
They soar, now downward headlong plunge, too close
To Earth. Her brother's steeds beneath her own 231
Much marvelling Luna sees. The scorching clouds
Begin to smoke. Each loftier prominence
Of Earth takes fire, and flames, and splits, and gapes
In fissures, parched and moistureless. The meads 235
Turn ashy white, nor leaf nor trunk of tree
Escapes, and drying harvests court the blaze.
Light mischief this, when cities whole with all
Their walls in ruin tumble, and some heap
Of ashes only tells that underneath 240
A nation lies consumed ! Each mount with all
Its forests flames ! Flames Athos' height and thine, Cilician Taurus : Tmolus, Oeta, burn,
And Ida, erst for many fountains famed,
Dry now, — and virgin-haunted Helicon, — 245
And Haemus, by that name of after time,
Aeagrius, yet unknown. With doubled blaze
Flames Aetna, — and Parnassus' cloven crest, —

Eryx, and Cynthus, Othrys, Rhodope
 Now first of snow dismantled, Dindyma, 250
 Mimas, and Mycale, and thou, for rite
 Of Bacchus famed, Cithaeron. Little now
 May Scythia's snows avail her! Caucasus
 Flares with the rest: — Ossa and Pindus burn,
 And, huger yet, Olympus, and the Alps 255
 Heaven-towering, and the cloud-capped Apennine!
 And now, where'er he turns his glance, the Youth
 Sees but a world on fire; nor heat so great Sustains, and, panting, draws each breath of air
 Scorching as furnace-blast, and feels the car 260
 Beneath him glow, — with ashes and thick shower
 Of fiery fragments choked, and blind with cloud
 Of stifling smoke: — nor where he was, or is,
 Or goes, can longer tell, but at the will 264
 Of those mad steeds whirls giddy through the skies!
 'T was then, they say, the Aethiop¹ — all his blood
 Drawn outward to the surface — first assumed
 That darker hue he wears: — then Libya first,
 Of all her moisture drained, an arid waste
 Became. Then with dishevelled locks the Nymphs 270
 For their lost founts went wailing. Sudden ceased
 Boeotian Dirce: — Aymone failed
 Her Argives: — and in Ephyra thy wave,
 Pirene, gushed no more. Nor rivers, proud
 Of widest bank and broadest flood, escaped 275
 The ruin. Tanais in mid-channel smoked,
 And aged Peneus, and thy Mysian stream,
 Caicus, and Ismenus swift, and thine,
 Arcadian Erymanthus, — Xanthus, doomed
 Later again to burn, — thy yellow wave, 280
 Lycormas, and Maeander, pleased to stray

¹ Used generally of the inhabitants of Africa.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Old Tellus,¹ ocean-girdled, — all her founts
 Or dried or in her bosom shrunk, — upraised
 Her parching brow, and, shading from her eyes
 With outspread hand the glare, and by her fears
 Shaken to lesser bulk and lower place 320

Than erst she held, with gasping accents spake.
 “O thou, of Gods the Sovereign!² if thy will
 Be thus, and I this fate have merited,
 Why linger yet thy lightnings? If by fire
 I perish, let it be by thine! My doom 325
 Will come the easier from thy hand. The prayer
 Thou seest how scarce my parching lips have strength To urge. My brows are scorched! my eyes are seared

And blind with ashes! Oh! is this the meed
 Of all my faithful duty? But for this 330
 Have I endured, the long year through, the tooth
 Of plough and gnawing harrow? But for this Borne for the herd its pasture, for the race
 Of men my harvests, for the Gods themselves 334
 Their incense? Say my doom is just; — but what,
 What hath my Brother³ done? Why thus from Heaven

More distant shrink the Waters to his rule
 Assigned? — But, if nor he nor I have power
 To move thee, let thy proper Heaven awake
 Thy pity! Look around thee! Either pole 340
 Already smokes — let these but burst in flame,
 And all thy palace topples! Atlas' self,
 Half stifled, scarce the glowing globe sustains!
 If Sea, and Land, and Sky must perish thus,
 Chaos again confounds us! Rescue yet 345
 What rests, and in thy mercy help the World!”

¹ The goddess of the earth.

² Jupiter.

³ Neptune.

She ceased, nor longer bore the heat, nor more
 Could utter, and within herself withdrew
 Low in her deepest cavern, neighboring close
 On Hades. Then the Sire Omnipotent 350
 Calling all Gods to witness, — and, most, him
 Who lent that fatal car, — how ruin threatens
 The world unless he aid it, to the top
 And citadel of Heaven betakes him, whence
 He darkens earth with storm-cloud, and bids roar 355
 The thunder, and the brandished lightning flings:
 Though now — so Fate would have it — was at hand
 Nor cloud, nor shower, to darken or to drown.
 But loud he thunders, and, with right hand high
 Uplifted, on the hapless charioteer 360
 Lets fly the bolts of fire, and hurls him down
 Headlong at once from car and life, and quells
 The fires with fire more potent. Terror strikes
 The steeds, and backward bounding from their necks
 The yoke they dash, and spurn the broken reins; —
 And here the curb, and here the axle lies, 366
 And separate here the pole, and here the spokes
 Of shattered wheels, and here what fragments else
 Strewed piecemeal of the car. Down, headlong down
 Falls Phaëthon, his streaming locks ablaze 370
 With flame, and shoots through air, as seems athwart
 The cloudless sky some midnight star to fall,
 Yet leaves no vacant space. Eridanus,
 Far from the land that gave him birth, receives
 His corse, and from his face the death-sweat laves. 375

The Hesperian Naiads gave his blackened form
 A tomb, and on the stone these lines engraved:
 “This is the grave of Phaëthon, who strove
 To guide his Father’s car; and, if he strove

In vain, at least in no mean venture failed." 380
 O'erwhelmed with grief that Father veiled, they say,
 His head, and left the World — believe who will —
 For one whole day without a Sun. The flames
 Awful supplied his place : — so came of ill
 Some good at least. But Clymene, when grief 385
 With all wild words to such a sorrow due
 Had spent its earliest force, forlorn and crazed
 Of soul, with careless vest and torn, all Earth
 Exploring traversed, in the hope to find
 His limbs, or, when the hope grew vain, his bones. 390
 To these, in that far land entombed, at last
 She comes, and o'er them broods, and with her tears
 Wets, as she reads, the name beloved, and warms
 The marble to her bosom pressed. Nor less 394
 His Heliad sisters¹ mourned ; with sobs and tears, — Vain gifts which Death not heeds, — and hands that beat
 Their breasts, and linked around the tomb, by day,
 By night, they call the Brother, whose dull ear
 No plaints of theirs may reach. Four times the Moon
 Her horns fresh filling, heard them, — for the wail 400
 From use was custom now : — when, as she bent
 To kneel, Phaëthusa, eldest born, her feet
 Felt stiffen, and Lampetie, at her cry
 Starting, took sudden root, and strove in vain
 For motion to her aid. The third, her hair 405
 In anguish tearing, tore off leaves ! And now
 Their legs grow fixed as trunks, their arms as boughs
 Extend, and upward round them creeps a bark
 That gradual folds the form entire, save yet
 The head and mouth that to their mother shrieks 410
 For help. What help is there to give ? Now here,

¹ The three daughters of Phoebus Apollo and Clymene.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

LIVY

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

THE greatest prose work of the Augustan age is the History of Rome from its earliest beginnings to 9 B. C. by Titus Livius. It was in all probability the author's intention to bring the narrative down to his own times, but he died before he had accomplished his task. There were one hundred and forty-two books in all, of which only thirty-five have survived, namely the first, third, fourth, and part of the fifth decade. The work was originally published in parts of varying length, as the presence of prefaces at various points in the narrative indicates. The division into decades was made by publishers of the fourth or fifth century.

According to St. Jerome's version of Eusebius, Livy was born at Padua in 59 B. C. He came of a good family and was carefully educated. Rhetoric was the most prominent element in the school curricula of the time, and in his case even special emphasis seems to have been laid upon it. He acquired, moreover, an adequate knowledge of literature, both Greek and Latin, and his interest in philosophy is attested by the fact that he wrote some dialogues on themes which fall within that field. He was probably about thirty years of age when he came to Rome, where he continued to reside till almost the close of his life. In the Civil War his sympathies had been with the party of Pompey, but Augustus harbored no resentment against him on this account, and the friendliest relations existed between the two men.

For the most part he kept aloof from public life and devoted himself exclusively to his historical work. The story that he was the tutor of Claudius, afterwards emperor, does not rest on very substantial foundations. It is, however, quite possible that it was on his suggestion that the prince turned his attention to historiography. It was after the accession of Tiberius that he retired to Padua, where he died in 17 A. D.

Judged from the point of view of modern historical research, Livy's work is open to criticism on many counts: there is a very limited use of original sources even where original sources were easily accessible; he shows but a scant knowledge of legal and constitutional history; he is not always wise in his choice of authorities; and very frequently we find a leaning in the direction of the picturesque and the dramatic that does not make for accuracy of statement. Yet whatever defects his work may have, its merits far outweigh them. And most conspicuous of these is his success in making his subject vital. He has revived the dry bones of history found in the jejune accounts of the annalists. His own scepticism in all matters of early history has not prevented his giving us glowing pictures of the various alleged occurrences that had become a part of Rome's tradition. The personalities of the kings, of the first consuls, and of all the heroes who had added their quota to the sum of their country's greatness, stand out clearly defined, and this long gallery of national portraits is a notable feature of his history. Equally effective is his treatment of situations and events within historic times. He has the artist's gift of singling out important and interesting elements, and reproducing them in rich phrases and rolling periods that remind us of the best period of Roman oratory. Now it is a scene in the Roman senate, now some phase of the struggle between the patricians and the plebeians, now a foreign war; but everywhere, no matter what the subject is, we find the same charm, the same distinction of style, the same vivid imagination and descriptive power. His accounts of battles almost invariably occasion more or less difficulty to the topographical experts, but even they will not dispute the claim that they are good battles. His description of Hannibal's march across the Alps leaves us in doubt as to what route was taken, but no reader will easily forget the impression made by those graphic pages. If we are to believe the statement of a later critic, one at any rate of his contemporaries saw traces of provincialism in his style, but the charge has never been made good, and the so-called Patavinitas of Livy (from Patavium, his native town) remains a mystery, a stylistic will o' the wisp, which has eluded many generations of scholars. The story of the citizen of Cadiz who travelled to Rome for the express purpose of seeing the great historian may be fairly adduced as an indication of the reputation he had in his own time, and the number of references to his work by later writers shows the esteem in which he was held by posterity.

THE HISTORIAN'S PREFACE

WHETHER in tracing the history of Rome from the foundation of the city I shall employ my time to good purpose, is a question which I cannot positively determine; nor, were it possible, would I venture to announce such determination; for I am aware that the matter is of high antiquity, and has been already treated by many others; the latest writers always supposing themselves capable either of throwing some new light on the subject or, by the superiority of their talents for composition, of excelling the more inelegant writers who preceded them. However that may be, I shall, at all events, derive no small satisfaction from the reflection that my best

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

is always indulged with the privilege of rendering the origin of cities more venerable by intermixing divine with human agency ; and if any nation may claim the privilege of being allowed to consider its origin as sacred, and to attribute it to the operations of the gods, surely the Roman people, who rank so high in military fame, may well expect that, while they choose to represent Mars as their own parent and that of their founder, the other nations of the world may acquiesce in this, with the same deference with which they acknowledge their sovereignty. But what degree of attention or credit may be given to these and similar matters I shall not consider as very material. To the following considerations I wish every one seriously and earnestly to attend, — by what kind of men, and by what sort of conduct, in peace and war, the empire has been both acquired and extended : then, as discipline gradually declined, let him follow in his thoughts the structure of ancient morals, at first, as it were, leaning aside, then sinking farther and farther, then beginning to fall precipitate, until he arrives at the present times, when our vices have attained to such a height of enormity, that we can no longer endure either the burden of them or the sharpness of the necessary remedies. This is the great advantage to be derived from the study of history ; indeed the only one which can make it answer any profitable and salutary purpose ; for being abundantly furnished with clear and distinct examples of every kind of conduct, we may select for ourselves and for the state to which we belong such as are worthy of imitation ; and carefully noting such as, being dishonorable in their principles, are equally so in their effects, learn to avoid them. Now, either partiality to the subject of my intended work misleads me, or there never was any state either greater or of purer morals, or richer in good examples, than this of Rome; nor was there ever any city into which avarice and luxury made their entrance so late, or where poverty and frugality were so highly and so long held in honor; men contracting their desires in proportion to the narrowness of their circumstances. Of late years, indeed, opulence has introduced a greediness of gain, and the boundless variety of dissolute pleasures has created in many a passion for ruining themselves, and all around them. But let us, in the first stage at least of this undertaking, avoid gloomy reflections, which, when perhaps unavoidable, will not even then be agreeable. If it were customary with us, as it is with poets, we would more willingly begin with good omens and vows and prayers to the gods and goddesses that they would propitiously grant success to our endeavors in the prosecution of so arduous a task.¹

THE RAPE OF THE SABINE WOMEN

(I., 4.)

THE Roman state had now attained such a degree of power that it was a match in arms for any of the neighboring nations; but from the small number of its women, its greatness was not likely to last longer than one age of man, as they had neither hopes of offspring among themselves nor had yet contracted any intermarriages with their neighbors. Romulus, therefore, by advice of the senate, sent ambassadors round to all adjoining states, soliciting their alliance, and permission for his new subjects to marry among them: he intimated to them that “cities, like everything else, rise from low beginnings; that in time those which are supported by their own merit and the favor of the gods procure to themselves great power and a great name; and that he had full assurance both that the gods favored the founding of Rome, and that the people would not be deficient in merit. Wherefore, as men, they ought to show no reluctance to mix their blood and race with men.” In no one place were his ambassadors favorably heard; such contempt of them did people entertain, and at the same time such apprehensions of danger to themselves and their posterity from so great a power growing up in the midst of them. By the greater part they were dismissed with the question, “whether they had opened an asylum for women also, for that would be the only way to procure suitable matches for them?” This was highly resented by the Roman youth; to such an extent, indeed, that the business appeared evidently to point towards violence. Romulus, in order to afford them a convenient time and place for a design of that sort, dissembling his displeasure, prepared with that intent to celebrate solemn games in honor of the equestrian Neptune, to which he gave the name of Consualia. He then ordered the intended celebration to be proclaimed among the neighboring nations, while his people exerted themselves in making the most magnificent preparations that their knowledge and abilities allowed, in order to gain attention and raise expectation. Great numbers of people assembled; induced, in some measure, by a desire of seeing the new city; especially those whose countries lay nearest, the Caeniniensians, Crustuminians and Antemnatians; in particular

¹ Baker's translation has been used for all the selections from Livy.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

and told them that “this proceeding had been occasioned by the haughtiness of their parents, who refused to allow their neighbors to marry among them; that, notwithstanding this, they should be united to his people in wedlock in the common enjoyment of all property, and of their common children; a bond of union than which the human heart feels none more endearing. He begged of them to soften their resentment, and to bestow their affections on those men on whom chance had bestowed their persons. It often happened, he said, that to harsh treatment mutual regard had succeeded, and they would find their husbands behave the better on this very account; that every one would exert himself, not merely in performing his duty as a husband, but to make up to them for the loss of their parents and of their country.” To these persuasions was added the soothing behavior of their husbands themselves, who urged in extenuation of their violence that they had been tempted to commit the excess from passion and the force of love: arguments, than which there can be none more powerful to assuage the irritation of the female mind.

HORATIUS ¹

(I., 10.)

As the enemy drew nigh, every one moved hastily from the country into the city, on every side of which strong guards were posted. Some parts seemed well secured by the walls, others by the Tiber running close to them. The Sublician¹ bridge was very near affording the enemy an entrance, had it not been for one man, Horatius Cocles : no other bulwark had the fortune of Rome on that day. He happened to be posted on guard at the bridge, and when he saw the Janiculum² taken by a sudden assault, and the enemy pouring down thence in full speed, his countrymen in disorder and confusion, no longer attempting opposition but quitting their ranks, he caught hold of every one that he could, and, appealing to gods and men, assured them that "it was in vain that they fled, after deserting the post which could protect them ; that if they passed the bridge and left it behind them, they would soon see greater numbers of the enemy in the Palatium and the Capitol than in the Janiculum ; wherefore he advised and warned them to break down the bridge by their swords, fire, or any other effectual means, while he should sustain the attack of the enemy, as long as it was possible for one person to withstand them. He then advanced to the first entrance of the bridge, and being easily distinguished from those who showed their backs in retreating from the fight, facing to the front, with his arms prepared for action, he astonished the enemy by his wonderful intrepidity. Shame, however, prevailed on two to remain with him, Spurius Lartius and Titus Herminius, both of them men of distinguished families and characters : with their assistance he for a time supported the first storm and the most furious part of the fight. Even these he sent back, when the bridge was nearly destroyed, and those who were employed in breaking it down called on them to retire; then darting fierce, menacing looks at each of the leaders of the Etrurians, he sometimes challenged them singly, sometimes upbraided them all together, as slaves of haughty kings, who, incapable of relishing liberty themselves, had come to wrest it from others. For a considerable time they hesitated, looking about for some other to begin the combat. Then shame at length put their troops in motion, and setting up a shout, they poured their javelins from all sides against their single opponent. But when all these stuck in the shield with which he guarded himself, and he still persisted in keeping possession of his post, they had now resolved, by making a violent push, to force him from it, when the crash of the falling bridge, and at the same time a shout raised by the Romans, filled them with sudden dismay, and stopped them from proceeding in the attempt. Then Cocles said, "Holy father Tiberinus, I beseech thee to receive these arms, and this thy soldier, into thy propitious stream." With these words, armed as he was, he leaped down into the Tiber, and through showers of darts which fell around him, swam safe across to his friends, having exhibited a degree of intrepidity which in after times was more generally celebrated than believed. The state showed a grateful sense of such high desert: a statue was erected to him in the Comitium, and he was given a grant of land as large as he could plough completely in one day. The zeal of private persons too was conspicuous amidst the honors conferred on him by the public; for, great as the scarcity then was, every one contributed something to him, in proportion to the stock of their family, abridging themselves of their own proper support.

¹ Horatius' defence of the bridge took place on the occasion of an attempt by Tarquinius Superbus, aided by Lars Porsena, king of the Etruscan city of Clusium, to recover his sovereignty in Rome.

¹ Literally, the pile-bridge.

² The hill on the Etruscan side of the Tiber.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

his son Hannibal, then about nine years of age, solicited him with boyish fondness to take him with him. Whereupon he brought him up to the altars, and compelled him to lay his hand on the consecrated victims and swear that as soon as he should be in power, he would show himself an enemy to the Roman people. Being a man of high spirit, he was deeply chagrined at the loss of Sicily and Sardinia; for he considered Sicily as given up by his countrymen by too hasty despair of their affairs, and Sardinia as fraudulently snatched out of their hands by the Romans during the commotions in Africa, with the additional insult of a tribute imposed upon them.

HANNIBAL

(XXI., 4.)

A FEW, particularly those of the best understanding, concurred in opinion with Hanno;¹ but, as it generally happens, the more numerous party prevailed over the more judicious. Hannibal was sent into Spain, and upon his first arrival attracted the notice of the whole army. The veteran soldiers imagined that Hamilcar was restored to them from the dead, observing in him the same animated look and penetrating eye, the same expression of countenance, and the same features. Then, such was his behavior, that in a short time the memory of his father was the least among their inducements to esteem him. Never before had a man possessed a genius so admirably fitted to the discharge of offices so opposite in their very nature as obeying and commanding, so that it was not easy to discern whether he were more beloved by the general or by the soldiers. There was none to whom Hasdrubal¹ preferred to intrust the command in any case where courage and activity were required, nor did the soldiers ever feel a greater degree of confidence and boldness under any other commander. With perfect intrepidity in facing danger, he possessed, in the midst of the greatest, perfect presence of mind. No degree of labor could either fatigue his body or break his spirit: heat and cold he endured with equal firmness; the quantity of his food and drink was limited by natural appetite, not by the pleasure of the palate. His seasons for sleeping and waking were not distinguished by the day or by the night; whatever time he had to spare, after business was finished, he gave to repose, which however he never courted either by a soft bed or quiet retirement: he was often seen, covered with a cloak, lying on the ground in the midst of the soldiers on guard, and on the advanced posts. His dress had nothing in particular in it beyond that of others of the same rank; his horses and his armor he was always remarkably attentive to; and whether he acted among the horsemen or the infantry, he was eminently the first of either, the foremost in advancing to the fight, the last who quitted the field of battle. These great virtues were counterbalanced in him by vices of equal magnitude, — inhuman cruelty, perfidy beyond that of a Carthaginian, a total disregard of truth, and of every obligation deemed sacred; utterly devoid of all reverence for the gods, he paid no regard to an oath, no respect to religion. Endowed with such disposition, a compound of virtues and vices, he served under the command of Hasdrubal for three years, during which he omitted no opportunity of improving himself in every particular, both of theory and practice, that could contribute to the forming of an accomplished general.

¹ A distinguished Carthaginian, who bitterly opposed the plans of Hamilcar, and afterwards of Hannibal.

¹ Son-in-law of Hamilcar, in command of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was assassinated in 220 B. C., and Hannibal was chosen to take his place.

THE MARCH ACROSS THE ALPS ¹

(XXI., 32-38.)

IN about three days after Hannibal's moving from the bank of the Rhone, the consul Publius Cornelius had come with his forces in order of battle to the camp of the enemy, intending to fight them without delay. But finding the fortifications abandoned, and concluding that, as they had got the start of him so far, it would be difficult to overtake them, he marched back to the sea where his ships lay; for he judged that he might thus with greater ease and safety meet Hannibal on his descent from the Alps. However, not to leave Spain, the province which the lots had assigned to his care, destitute of the aid of the Roman troops, he sent his brother Cneius Scipio with the greater part of his forces against Hasdrubal,² with the expectation of not merely protecting old

¹ Hannibal had started from New Carthage, on the east coast of Spain, in the spring of 218 B. C. In a few months he had reduced the tribes north of the Ebro, crossed the Pyrenees, and advanced as far as the Rhone. The consul Publius Cornelius Scipio had sailed with his forces to Gaul, in hopes of intercepting him before he reached the Alps.

² The brother of Hannibal. See note on page 361.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

and that at night they separated to their several dwellings, he advanced at the first dawn to the eminences, as if with the design of forcing his way through the pass. This feint he carried on through the whole day, his men at the same time fortifying a camp in the spot where they were drawn up. As soon as he understood that the mountaineers had retired from the heights and withdrawn their guards, he made, for a show, a greater number of fires than was proportioned to the troops who remained in the camp, and leaving behind the baggage with the cavalry and the greater part of the infantry, he himself, with a light-armed band composed of the most daring men in the army, pushed rapidly through the pass, and took post on those very eminences of which the enemy had been in possession.

At the first dawn of the next day the rest of the army began to march forward. By this time the mountaineers, on a given signal, were coming together out of their fortresses to their usual station; when on a sudden they perceived a part of the enemy over their heads in possession of their own strong post, and the rest passing along the road. Both these circumstances striking them at once, they were for some time incapable of thought, or of turning their eyes to any other object. Afterwards, when they observed the confusion in the pass, and that the body of the enemy was disordered on their march by the hurry among themselves, and particularly by the unruliness of the affrighted horses, they thought that if they could augment in any degree the terror under which the army already labored, they could destroy it. They therefore ran down the rocks in an oblique direction through pathless and circuitous ways which habitual practice rendered easy to them. And now the Carthaginians had to contend at once with the Gauls and the disadvantage of the ground, and there was a greater struggle among themselves than with the enemy, for every one strove to get first out of danger. But the greatest disorder was occasioned by the horses, which, affrighted at the dissonant clamors, multiplied by the echoes from the woods and valleys, became nearly unmanageable; and when they happened to receive a stroke or a wound, grew so unruly as to overthrow numbers of men and heaps of baggage of all sorts; and as there were abrupt passages on each side of the pass, their violence cast down many to an immense depth, so that the fall of such great masses caused a dreadful effect. Although these were shocking sights to Hannibal, yet he kept his place for a while, and restrained the troops that were with him, lest he should increase the tumult and confusion. Afterwards, seeing the line of the army broken, and that there was danger of their being wholly deprived of their baggage, in which case the effecting of their passage would answer no purpose, he hastened down from the higher ground; and while by the mere rapidity of his motion he dispersed the forces of the enemy, he at the same time increased the confusion among his own. But this, when the roads were cleared by the flight of the mountaineers, was instantly remedied, and the whole army was soon brought through the pass not only without disturbance, but almost without any noise. He then seized a fort, which was the capital of that district, and several villages that lay around it, and fed his army for three days with cattle taken from the fugitives. During these three days, as he was not incommoded by the mountaineers, nor much by the nature of the ground, he made a considerable progress in his march.

He then reached the territory of another state, which was thickly inhabited for a mountainous country: there he was very near suffering a defeat, not only by open force, but by his own arts, treachery, and ambush. Some men of advanced age, governors of their forts, came to the Carthaginian as ambassadors, with humble representations that "as the calamities of others had afforded them a profitable lesson, they wished to make trial of the friendship rather than of the strength of the Carthaginians. That they were therefore resolved to yield obedience to all his commands, and requested him to accept provisions and guides on his march, and hostages to insure the performance of their engagements." Hannibal neither hastily crediting, nor yet slighting their offers, lest, if rejected, they might declare openly against him, after returning a favorable answer, accepted the hostages, and made use of the provisions which they had, of their own accord, brought to the road; but followed the guides, not as through a friendly country, but with the strictest order in his march. The elephants and cavalry composed the van, and he himself followed with the main body of the infantry, carefully inspecting every particular. On their coming into a road narrower than the rest, confined on one side by an impending hill, the barbarians rising up on all sides from places where they had lain concealed, assailed them in front and rear, in close and in distant fight, rolling down also huge rocks on the troops. The most numerous body pressed on the rear. There the main force of infantry was ready to oppose them; but had not that been very

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

with toil and fighting; and in this time several of the beasts which had fallen among the rocks, following the tracks of the army, came into camp. Tired as the troops were of struggling so long with hardships, they found their terrors very much increased by a fall of snow, this being the season of the setting of the constellation Pleiades.¹ The troops were put in motion with the first light; and as they marched slowly over ground which was entirely covered with snow, dejection and despair being strongly marked in every face, Hannibal went forward before the standards, and ordering the soldiers to halt on a projecting eminence, from which there was a wide extended prospect, made them take a view of Italy, and of the plains about the Po, stretching along the foot of the mountains; then told them that “they were now scaling the walls, not only of Italy, but of the city of Rome: that all the rest would be plain and smooth; and after one or at most a second battle, they would have the bulwark and capital of Italy in their power and disposal.” The army then began to advance, the enemy now desisting from any farther attempts on them except by trifling parties for pillaging, as opportunity offered. But the way was much more difficult than it had been in the ascent, the declivity on the Italian side of the Alps being in most places shorter, and consequently more perpendicular; while the whole way was narrow and slippery, so that the soldiers could not prevent their feet from sliding, nor, if they made the least false step, could they, on falling, stop themselves: and thus men and beasts tumbled promiscuously over one another.

Then they came to a ridge much narrower than the others, and composed of rock so upright that a light-armed soldier, making the trial, could with difficulty by laying hold of bushes and roots, which appeared here and there, accomplish the descent. In this place the precipice, originally great, had by a late falling away of the earth been increased to the depth of at least one thousand feet. Here the cavalry stopped, as if at the end of their journey, and Hannibal, wondering what could be the cause of the troops' halting, was told that the cliff was impassable. Then going up himself to view the place, it seemed clear to him that he must lead his army in a circuit, though ever so great, and through tracks never trodden before. That way, however, was found to be impracticable. The old snow indeed had become hard, and being covered with the new of a moderate depth, the men found good footing as they walked through it; but when that was dissolved by the treading of so many men and beasts, they then trod on the naked ice below. Here they were much impeded, because the foot could take no hold on the smooth ice, and was besides more apt to slip on account of the declivity of the ground; and whenever they attempted to rise, either by aid of the hands or knees, they fell again. Add to this that there were neither stumps nor roots within reach, on which they could lean for support; so that they wallowed in the melted snow on one entire surface of slippery ice. This the cattle sometimes penetrated as soon as their feet reached the lower bed; and sometimes, when they lost their footing, by striking more strongly with their hoofs in striving to keep themselves up, they broke it entirely through; so that the greatest part of them, as if caught in traps, stuck fast in the hard, deep ice.

¹ The beginning of November.

At length, after men and beasts were heartily fatigued to no purpose, they fixed a camp on the summit, having with very great difficulty cleared even the ground which that required, so great was the quantity of snow to be dug and carried off. The soldiers were then employed to make a way down the steep, through which alone it was possible to effect a passage ; and as it was necessary to break the mass, they felled and lopped a number of huge trees which stood near, which they raised into a vast pile, and as soon as a smart wind arose, to forward the kindling of it, set it on fire ; and then, when the stone was violently heated, made it crumble to pieces by pouring on vinegar. When the rock was thus disjoined by the power of the heat, they opened a way through it with iron instruments, and inclined the descents with it in such a manner, that not only the beasts of burden, but even the elephants could be brought down. Four days were spent about this rock, during which the cattle were nearly destroyed by hunger ; for the summits are for the most part bare, and whatever little pasture there might have been was covered with snow. In the lower parts are valleys and some hills, which, enjoying the benefit of the sun, with rivulets at the side of the woods, are better suited to become the residence of human beings. There the horses were sent out to pasture, and the men, fatigued with the labor on the road, allowed to rest for three days. They then descended into the plains, where the climate, like the character of the inhabitants, was of a milder cast.

In this manner, as nearly as can be ascertained, they accomplished their passage into Italy, in the fifth month, according to some authors, after leaving New Carthage, having spent fifteen days in crossing the

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies into Hither Gaul should at that time have been open: those, especially, which led to the Pennine Hill would have been blocked up by nations half German. And besides, if the assertions of the inhabitants be admitted as an argument of any weight, it must be allowed that the Veragrians, the inhabitants of that very hill, deny that the name was given to these mountains from any passage of the Carthaginians, and allege that it was so named from a person, called by the mountaineers Penninus, worshipped as a divinity on the highest peak.

THE BATTLE OF CANNAE¹

(XXII., 44-49.)

THE consuls pursued the Carthaginians, taking proper care to examine the roads: when they arrived near Cannae, and had the foe in sight, they divided their forces as before, and fortified two camps at nearly the same distance from each other as they had been at Geronium. As the river Aufidus ran by the camps of both, the watering parties of both had access to it, as opportunity served, but not without encountering opposition. The Romans, however, in the smaller camp, which was pitched on the other side of the Aufidus, had greater liberty of supplying themselves with water, because there were none of the enemy posted on the farther bank. Hannibal now, conceiving hopes that the consuls might be brought to an engagement in this tract, where the nature of the ground was advantageous to cavalry, in which kind of force he had a manifest superiority, drew out his army in order of battle, and endeavored to provoke them by skirmishes of the Numidians. On this the Roman camp was again thrown into disturbance by mutinous behavior on the part of the soldiers, and dissension between the consuls; Paulus represented to Varro the fatal rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius; and Varro to him the example of Fabius as a specious precedent for timid and inactive commanders: the one¹ calling gods and men to witness that none of the blame was to be imputed to him of Hannibal's now holding Italy as if by prescriptive right of possession; for he was chained down by his colleague, while the soldiers, full of rage and ardor for the fight, were kept unarmed. To which the other replied that, if any misfortune should happen to the legions from their being hurried into an inconsiderate and rash engagement, he himself, although entirely free from all reproach, must yet bear a share of the consequences, be they what they might. Let him take care that those whose tongues were now so ready and impetuous showed the same alertness during the fight.

¹ Hannibal had already defeated the Romans at the river Ticinus (218 B. C.), at the river Trebia (218), and at Lake Trasimenus (217), when he met them at Cannae, a village in Apulia, in 216.

While, instead of deliberating on proper measures, they thus wasted time in altercation, Hannibal, who had kept his forces drawn up in order of battle during a great part of the day, led back the rest towards the camp, and despatched the Numidian horse to the other side of the river to attack a watering party, which had come from the smaller camp of the Romans. They had scarcely reached the opposite bank when, merely by their shout and the rapidity of their motions, they dispersed this disorderly crowd; and then pushed forward against an advanced guard stationed before the rampart, and almost up to the very gates. The Romans, in having their camp threatened by a band of irregular auxiliaries, felt an intolerable affront, so that nothing could have restrained them from drawing out their forces and passing the river, but from the chief command being in the hands of Paulus. On the next day, therefore, Varro, whose turn it was to command, without conferring with his colleague, displayed the signal for battle, and, marshalling his forces, led them over the river, while Paulus followed; because, though he did not approve of his design, yet he could not avoid giving him his support. Having crossed the river, they were joined by the troops from the smaller camp, and formed their line in this manner: on the right wing, next the river, they placed the Roman cavalry, and adjoining them the Roman infantry; the extreme of the left wing was composed of the confederate cavalry; and, inclosed by these, the confederate infantry stretched to the centre, so as to unite with the Roman legions. The archers and other light-armed auxiliaries formed the van. The consuls commanded the wings, Terentius the left, Aemilius the right; the charge of the centre was committed to Geminus Servilius.

¹ Varro.

Hannibal, at the first light, sending before him the Balearians and the other light-armed troops, crossed the river, and posted each company in his line of battle, in the same order in which he had led them over. The Gallic and Spanish cavalry occupied the left wing near the bank, opposite the Roman cavalry, and the Numidian horse the right; the infantry forming the centre in such a manner that both ends of their line were composed of Africans, and between these were placed the Gauls and Spaniards. The Africans, for the most part, resembled a body of Ro-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies to front, no room having been left for any evolutions, the river on the one side and the line of infantry on the other confining them, so that they could only push directly forward; at last, the horses being pressed together in a crowd and stopped from advancing, the riders, grappling man to man, dragged each other to the ground. The contest was now maintained chiefly on foot, but was more furious than lasting; for the Roman horsemen, unable to keep their stand, turned their backs. When the fight between the cavalry was almost decided, the infantry began to engage. At first the Gauls and Spaniards maintained their ranks without betraying any inferiority in strength or courage. At length the Romans, by frequent and persevering efforts, with their front regular and in compact order, drove back a body which projected before the rest of the line in form of a wedge, and which, being too thin, consequently wanted strength; as these gave ground, and retreated hastily and in disorder, they pursued, and without slacking their charge, broke the dismayed and shattered battalions; at first, to their centre line, and at length, meeting with no resistance, they arrived at the reserved troops of the Africans, which latter had been posted on both flanks of the others, inclining backwards towards the rear, while the centre, composed of Gauls and Spaniards, jutted considerably forward. By the retreat of this prominent part the front was first rendered even; then by their proceeding still in the same direction, a bending inward was at length formed in the middle, on each side of which the Africans now formed wings; and the Romans incautiously rushing into the centre, these flanked them on each side, and, by extending themselves from the extremities, surrounded them in the rear also. In consequence of this, the Romans, who had already finished one battle, leaving the Gauls and Spaniards, whom they had pursued with much slaughter, began a new engagement with the Africans, in which they had not only the disadvantage of being hemmed in, and in that position obliged to fight, but also that of being fatigued, while their antagonists were fresh and vigorous.

By this time the battle had begun also on the left wing of the Romans, where the confederate cavalry had been posted against the Numidians: it was languid at first, and commenced with a piece of Carthaginian treachery. About five hundred Numidians, carrying, besides their usual armor and weapons, swords concealed under their coats of mail, rode up under the appearance of deserters, with their bucklers behind their backs; and having hastily alighted from their horses, and thrown their bucklers and javelins at the feet of their enemies, were received into the centre line, and conducted thence to the hindmost ranks, where they were ordered to sit down in the rear. There they remained quiet until the fight was begun in every quarter: when, however, the thoughts and eyes of all were deeply intent on the battle, snatching up the shields which lay in great numbers among the heaps of the slain, they fell on the rear of the Romans, and stabbing the men in the backs, and cutting their hams, made great slaughter, and caused still greater terror and confusion. While in one part dismay and flight prevailed, in another there was obstinate fighting in spite of despair. Hasdrubal, who commanded on the left wing, after entirely routing the Roman cavalry, went off to the right, and, joining the Numidians, put to flight the cavalry of the allies. Then, leaving the Numidians to pursue them, with his Gallic and Spanish horse he made a charge on the rear of the Roman infantry, while they were busily engaged with the Africans.

On the other side of the field Paulus had, in the very beginning of the action, received a grievous wound from a sling; nevertheless, at the head of a compact band, he frequently opposed Hannibal; and in several places he restored the fight, being protected by the Roman horsemen, who in the end dismounted, because the consul's strength declined so far that he was not able even to manage his horse. Hereupon, some one telling Hannibal that the consul had ordered the cavalry to dismount, he answered, as we are told, "I should have been much better pleased if he had delivered them to me in chains." The fight maintained by the dismounted cavalry was such as might be expected, when the enemy had gained undoubted possession of the victory; and, as the vanquished chose to die on the spot rather than fly, the victors, enraged at them for retarding their success, put to death those whom they could not drive from their ground. They did, however, at length oblige them to quit the field, their numbers being reduced to a few, and those quite spent with toil and wounds. They were all dispersed, and such as were able repaired to their horses, in order to make their escape. Cneius Lentulus, a military tribune, seeing, as he rode by, the consul sitting on a stone and covered with blood, said to him, "Lucius Aemilius,¹ whom the gods ought to favor as the only person free

¹ Lucius Aemilius Paulus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

number of the slain is computed at forty thousand foot and two thousand seven hundred horse, the loss of natives and of confederates being nearly equal. Among these were the quaestors belonging to both consuls, Lucius Atilius and Lucius Furius Bibaculus; twenty-one military tribunes; several who had passed through the offices of consul, praetor, or aedile, among whom were reckoned Cneius Servilius Geminus, and Marcus Minucius, who had been master of the horse in the preceding year, and consul some years before; likewise eighty who were members of the Senate, or had borne those offices which qualified them for membership in that body, and who had voluntarily enlisted as soldiers in the legions. The prisoners taken in this battle are reckoned at three thousand foot and three hundred horse.

THE CARTHAGINIANS IN CAPUA

(XXIII., 17.)

HERE,¹ during the greater part of the winter, Hannibal kept his forces lodged in houses,—men who had frequently and long endured with firmness every hardship to which human nature is liable, and had never been accustomed to, nor ever had experienced the comforts of prosperity. And it came about that they, whom no power of adversity had been able to subdue, were ruined by an excess of good fortune and by immoderate pleasures. These produced effects the more pernicious because, being hitherto unaccustomed, as I have said, to such indulgences, they plunged into them with greater avidity. Sleep and wine, feasting and harlots, with which through habit they became daily more and more delighted, enervated both their minds and bodies to such a degree that they owed their preservation rather to the name they had acquired by their past victories than to their present strength. In the opinion of persons skilled in the art of war the general was guilty of a greater fault in this instance than in not leading his army directly to the city of Rome after the battle of Cannae; for that dilatory conduct might be supposed only to have deferred the conquest for a time, whereas this latter error left him destitute of the strength to effect it. Accordingly he marched out of Capua as if with a different army, for it did not retain in any particular the slightest remnant of the former discipline. Most of the men returned to the field encumbered with harlots; and, as soon as they began to live in tents, and were obliged to undergo the fatigue of marches and other military labors, like raw recruits, their strength both of body and mind failed them; and from that time, during the whole course of the summer campaign, great numbers used to steal away from their standards without leave; and the only lurking-place of all these deserters was Capua.

¹ Capua, a rich city in Campania, which had opened its gates to Hannibal.

THE END OF THE WAR¹

(XXX., 44, 45.)

THE last peace² with the Carthaginians had been made forty years before this, in the consulate of Quin-

¹ On Hannibal's leaving Italy in 203 B. C., the Romans carried the war into Africa, and, under the leadership of Publius Scipio Africanus, defeated the Carthaginians at Zama in 202. Peace was concluded in the following year.

² In 241 B. C., after the First Punic War.

tus Lutatius and Aulus Manlius. The late war began twenty-three years after, in the consulate of Publius Cornelius and Tiberius Sempronius, and ended in the seventeenth year, when Cneius Cornelius and Publius Aelius Paetus were consuls. We are told that Scipio often said afterwards, that the ambition, first of Tiberius Claudius, and then of Cneius Cornelius, was what prevented that war from ending in the utter destruction of Carthage. The Carthaginians, having been exhausted by the long continuance of the late struggles, found it difficult to raise the first contribution money, so that the senate house was filled with grief and lamentations, on which occasion, it is said, Hannibal was observed to laugh; and that being reproved by Hasdrubal Haedus¹ for laughing in a moment of public sorrowing, and when he himself was the cause of their tears, he said, "If the inward thoughts could be perceived in the same manner as the look of the countenance is perceived by the eye, you would be immediately convinced that the laughter which you blame proceeds not from a heart elated by joy, but from one driven almost to madness by misfortunes; and yet it is not by any means so unreasonable as those absurd and inconsistent tears of yours. Then ought you to have wept when our arms were taken from us, our ships burned, and we ourselves forbidden to engage in foreign wars; that was the wound by which we fell. And do not imagine that the measures taken against you by the Romans were dictated merely by animosity. No great state can remain long at rest. If it has no enemies abroad, it finds them at home; as overgrown bodies seem safe from external injuries, but suffer grievous incon-

¹ Hasdrubal, "the Kid," an opponent of Hannibal's party.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

cities pouring out to show their respect to him, but crowds of the country-people also filling up the roads. Thus he arrived at Rome, where he entered the city in the most splendid triumph which had ever been beheld. He carried into the treasury a hundred and twenty-three thousand pounds weight of silver, and out of the spoil distributed to each of his soldiers four hundred asses.¹ The death of Syphax caused some diminution in the splendor of the show, but none in the glory of the general who triumphed. He died a short time before at Tibur, to which place he had been removed from Alba. His death, however, made some noise, for he was honored with a public funeral. Polybius, a writer of no contemptible authority, asserts that this king was led in triumph. I have not been able to discover whether it was the affection of the soldiers, or the attachment of the people, which honored Scipio with the surname of Africanus; nor whether it was brought into use by the flattery of his friends, as that of Felix given to Sulla, and of Magnus to Pompey, in the memory of our fathers. He was certainly the first general distinguished by the title of a nation which he had subdued. Others, afterwards following his example, though far inferior in the greatness of their achievements, assumed pompous inscriptions for their statues, and splendid surnames for their families.

¹ The coin known as the "as" was at this time worth about 1.4 cents.

THE DEATH OF HANNIBAL¹

(XXXIX., 51.)

TITUS QUINTIUS FLAMININUS came as ambassador to King Prusias, who had incurred the jealousy of the Romans by entertaining Hannibal after the flight of Antiochus, and by making war on Eumenes. Soon after his arrival, among other discourse, he remonstrated with Prusias on his giving protection to a person who, of all men living, was the most inveterate enemy to the Roman nation; who had incited, first his own country, and afterwards, when its power was reduced, King Antiochus, to make war on Rome. In consequence of this, or of Prusias having himself a desire of gratifying Flamininus, a party of soldiers was sent to guard Hannibal's house. The Carthaginian had always foreseen such end of his life, for he knew the implacable hatred which the Romans bore him, and placed little confidence in the faith of kings. Besides, he had experienced the fickle temper of Prusias, and had for some time dreaded the arrival of Flamininus, as an event fatal to him. Surrounded as he was by dangers on all sides, in order to have always some passage of flight open, he had made seven doors in his house, of which some were concealed lest they might be invested by a guard. But the imperious government of kings suffers nothing to remain secret, which they choose to discover. The troops formed a circle of guards around the house in such a manner that it was impossible to slip out. Hannibal, on being told that some of the king's soldiers were in the porch, endeavored to escape through a back door, which was the most private, and whence the passage was least likely to be observed; but, perceiving that to be guarded, and every avenue round to be shut by a body of soldiers, he called for poison, which he had long kept in readiness for such an event, and said, "Let us release the Romans from their long anxiety, since they have not patience to wait for the death of an old man. Flaminius will gain no very great or memorable victory over one unarmed and betrayed. What an alteration has taken place in the behavior of the Roman people, this day affords abundant proof. Their fathers gave warning to Pyrrhus, their armed foe, then heading an army against them in Italy, to beware of poison. The present generation have sent an ambassador, of consular rank, to persuade Prusias villanously to murder his guest." Then imprecating curses on the head of Prusias, and on his kingdom, and calling on the gods, the avengers of violated hospitality, to witness his breach of faith, he drank off the contents of the cup. In this manner did Hannibal end his life.

¹ Hannibal remained at the head of the government for six years after the conclusion of peace with the Romans. Then, accused by his political enemies of planning to join forces with Antiochus, king of Syria, in another attack upon Rome, he was compelled, on pressure from the Romans, to flee from Carthage. He went first to Tyre, then to Ephesus, and finally to the court of Prusias, king of Bithynia.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

pense of fear or of hope. Yet he did not fling away life with precipitate haste, but having made an incision in his veins and then, according to his humor, bound them up, he again opened them, while he conversed with his friends, not in a serious strain or on topics that might win for him the glory of courage. And he listened to them as they repeated, not thoughts on the immortality of the soul or on the theories of philosophers, but light poetry and playful verses. To some of his slaves he gave liberal presents, a flogging to others. He dined, indulged himself in sleep, that death, though forced on him, might have a natural appearance. Even in his will he did not, as did many others in their last moments, flatter Nero or Tigellinus or any other of the men in power. On the contrary, he described fully the prince's shameful excesses, with the names of his male and female companions, and their novelties in debauchery, and sent the account under seal to Nero. Then he broke his signet ring, that it might not be subsequently available for imperilling others." ¹

Such is the sketch which Tacitus ² gives of the man who was in all probability the author of the Satirae, of which unfortunately only fragments of the fifteenth and sixteenth books remain. The work, which was for the most part in prose, contained an account of the adventures of one Encolpius and his companions on a journey in southern Italy. The interest which it has for us on the literary side as an example of the Roman novel, and on the linguistic side by reason of its contribution to our knowledge of colloquial Latin, is still further enhanced by its drastic representations of current abuses and strikingly realistic pictures of various aspects of the social life of the times.

¹ The translation is that of Church and Brodribb.

² Annals, xvi., 18, 19.

AT TRIMALCHIO'S DINNER¹

(Satirae, 41-46.)

As his departure delivered us from his usurpation of the talk, we tried to draw our neighbors into conversation. "What is a day?" cried Dama, after calling for a larger glass. "Nothing! Before you have time to turn round it is night. One should therefore go straight from the bedroom to the dining-room. And what a regular freezing we have been having of late! I could scarcely get hot in my bath. However, a hot drink is as good as a greatcoat. I've had some stiff ones, and I am about full; it has got into my head." Here Seleucus broke in with, "I don't take a bath every day. Constant washing wears out the body as well as the clothes; but when I've put down my good posset of mead, I can tell the cold go hang. However, I could not have bathed to-day in any case, as I had to attend a funeral. Poor Chrysanthus, you know, a nice fellow, has just slipped his wind. It was only the other day he said how d'ye do to me. I can fancy I am talking to him now. Ah, we are only air balloons, summer flies; this life's a bubble. And it's not as if he had n't tried the fasting cure. For five days neither bit nor surpassed his lips, and yet he's gone. Too many doctors did for him, or else it was to be. A doctor's really no use except to feel you did the right thing.

¹ The longest extant section of the Satirae is that which contains a description of a dinner party given by Trimalchio, a rich parvenu of the freedman class. This selection reproduces the conversation which took place among some of the guests, freedmen like Trimalchio, during a temporary absence of the host.

An excellent funeral it was, — superior bier and trappings, and the mourners first class.” He was becoming a bore, and Phileros interrupted him with, “Oh, let us leave the dead alone. He’s all right. He had a decent life and a decent death. What has he to complain of? He rose from the gutter, and was once so poor that he would have picked a farthing out of a midden with his teeth. But he grew like a honeycomb. I suppose he has left behind him a cool 100,000, and all in hard cash. To speak the truth — for, as you know, I wear my heart upon my sleeve — he was a rough-spoken fellow, quarrelsomeness personified. Now his brother was a fine, friendly, open-handed gentleman, and kept a good table. At first everything went ugly with him, but his first vine-crop pulled him together; he sold his wine for whatever he chose to ask. But what really kept his head above water was that legacy, when he walked into a good deal more than was left him. That was why that blockhead Chrysanthus quarrelled with his own brother, and left away his money to some Tom, Dick, or Harry. It’s an ill turn when a man turns his back on his own. He took all his slaves told him for gospel, and they played the deuce with him. Credulity is fatal, especially for a business man. However, he got far more than he deserved; Fortune’s favorite, lead turned to gold under his hands. And how many years do you think he had on his back? Seventy and more, I should say. But he was as hard as nails, and carried his age splendidly, — as black as a crow. Ah, I knew him long, long ago, when he did something smack, something grow to. He had a general kind of taste. Well, he enjoyed himself, and I for one don’t blame him. It’s all he takes to the grave with him.”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

so are others. We mustn't be too particular. The sky's above us all. If you lived somewhere else, you would say that here the pigs were going about ready to roast, crying, 'Who'll eat me?'"

R. Y. TYRRELL.

MARTIAL

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

BORN at Bilbilis, a town in the province of Tarraconensis in Spain, Martial came to Rome in 64 A. D., when he was about twenty years of age. Throughout the whole period of his residence in the capital he was a client, one of that numerous class of needy dependents who relied for their support solely upon the generosity of their patrons. It was not at any time a position of dignity, but in the case of Martial, who had no difficulty in securing the patronage of rich and influential citizens, it carried with it a fair competence, and afforded him boundless opportunities for coming in contact with those sides of Roman life which furnished the best material for the pen of the epigrammatist.

The Liber Spectaculorum, a collection of pieces on shows given mostly in the Flavian Amphitheatre, twelve books of Epigrams, and two books of Xenia and Apophoreta, distichs intended to accompany presents such as were exchanged on the Saturnalia, make up the list of Martial's extant works. In the Epigrams, which are the poet's most important contribution to Latin literature, we find a great variety of subjects. It was the field that he made peculiarly his own, and he worked in it with such success that from his time down to the present day his name has been identified with the Epigram as a literary type. When we attempt to select individual pictures from the long gallery which he has left us, we find ourselves confronted by an embarrassment of riches. He had a quick eye for the weaknesses of his fellows, and was merciless in attacking the hypocrisies and foibles of the age. His was not, indeed, the standpoint of outraged morality, for many of his poems are marked by gross adulation and still grosser obscenity; but without making any pretences himself, he regarded the different types of character he saw around him as fair marks for his satire: Selius, who patrols the whole town in the hope of meeting some one who will invite him to dinner (II., 14); Tongilius, who pretends to be ill in order to obtain presents of wine and food (II., 40); Diaulus, who hit upon the lucrative combination of being at once physician and undertaker (I., 47); Symmachus, who, going out with a retinue of medical students to visit a patient, found him without a fever but left him with one (V., 9). These are a few examples chosen at random from a long list.

The greater part of Martial's work was done during the reign of Domitian, who showed him some signs of favor. After the death of the tyrant he seems to have found the atmosphere at Rome less congenial, and a few years later, early in Trajan's reign, he retired to Bilbilis, where he died about 104 A. D.

A FRIEND

(Epigrams, I., 39.)

Is there a man whose friendship rare
 With antique friendship may compare,
 In learning steeped, both old and new,
 Yet unpedantic, simple, true;
 Whose soul, ingenuous and upright,
 Ne'er formed a wish that shunned the light,
 Whose sense is sound? If such there be,
 My Decianus, thou art he.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

The labors,¹ that destroy each dish,
 Were useful coats for frying fish.
 Affirm, my Bard, this dire decree :
 Else you shall sup alone for me.

JAMES ELPHINSTON.

A ROMAN DAY

(Epigrams, IV., 8.)

VISITS² consume the first, the second hour ;
 When comes the third, hoarse pleaders³ show their power.

At four to business Rome herself betakes ;
 At six she goes to sleep ;⁴ by seven she wakes.
 By nine, well breathed from exercise, we rest,
 And in the banquet hall the couch is pressed.
 Now, when thy skill, greatest of cooks, has spread
 The ambrosial feast, let Martial's rhymes be read,
 With mighty hand while Cæsar⁵ holds the bowl,
 When draughts of nectar have relaxed his soul.
 Now trifles pass. My giddy Muse would fear
 Jove to approach in morning mood severe.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

THE TRUE BUSINESS OF LIFE

(Epigrams, V., 20.)

O COULD both thou and I, my friend,
 From care and trouble freed,

¹ The manuscripts of the poems would have been more useful as wrappers for fish.

² It was customary for clients to assemble at their patron's house for the salutatio early in the morning.

³ In the law-courts.

⁴ The siesta was universal.

⁵ The Emperor Domitian.

Our quiet days at pleasure spend
And taste of life indeed,

We 'd bid farewell to marble halls,
The sad abodes of state,
The law, with all its dismal brawls,
The trappings of the great ;

We 'd seek the book, the cheerful talk,
At noonday in the shade,
The bath, the ride, the pleasant walk
In the cool colonnade.

Dead to our better selves we see
The golden hours take flight,
Still scored against us as they flee,
Then haste to live aright.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

A JUGGLER

(Epigrams, IX., 38.)

LITTLE, nimble Agathine,
What consummate art is thine !
Play thy postures, one and all ;
Never will the target ¹ fall.
Thee it follows everywhere :
Swooping through the easy air,
To thy hand or foot it flies,
On thy back or shoulder lies.
Slipp'ry footing proves no dread,
Though the shower Corycian ² shed ;

¹ Shield.

² The stage was sprinkled with saffron from Corycus in Cilicia.

Though the rapid southern gales
 Strive to rend theatric veils.¹
 Still secure, the careless boy
 Flings from limb to limb the toy ;
 And the artist well may brave
 All the force of wind and wave.
 Little, dextrous Agathine
 To eschew should'st thou incline,
 Poor thy chance, alone of this :
 Who still hits can never miss.
 Thou must change thy postures all ;
 Else the target ne'er will fall.

JAMES ELPHINSTON.

DEATH OF A CHARIOTEER

(Epigrams, X., 50.)

LET Victory, sorrowing, cast her palm away,
 Let Favor beat her breast and wail the day,
 Let Honor don the mourner's dark attire,
 And Glory fling her wreath upon the pyre.
 Snatched in his prime, Scorpus, sad thought ! must go
 To yoke night's horses in the realm below.
 Swift flew the chariot, soon the goal was won,
 Another race thou hast too quickly run.

GOLDWIN SMITH.

¹ The awning which protected the spectators from the sun.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

charming little dialogue on the decline of oratory under the empire. The style, which differs in a striking manner from that of his other works, shows many signs of Ciceronian influence. In the Agricola and Germania, also of small compass, we see Tacitus tending in the direction of historiography, the field to which he afterwards confined himself. Yet neither of these monographs is, strictly speaking, an historical work. The Agricola is an example of encomiastic biography, in which the historical form is adopted only to give the encomiastic element greater effectiveness; while the Germania, formally and primarily an ethnographical treatise, seems from its idealization of the simplicity and virtue of the northern people to indicate some desire on the part of the author to reflect upon the deterioration of morals among the Romans.

Of much wider scope are the two great historical works, the Historiae and the Annales. The former, which in all probability originally consisted of fourteen books, was a history of the empire from 69 A. D. to the death of Domitian. Of this only the first four books and a part of the fifth have survived, containing an account of 69 and 70, the crowded years that saw the reigns of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, and the triumph of the Flavians. The Annales (there were sixteen books in all, but the central portion of the work is lost) dealt with the period from the death of Augustus in 14 A. D. to the fall of Nero. It is the author's masterpiece: of prime importance, historically, for its masterly descriptions of political situations, and its subtle analysis of the characters of the great personages of the early empire; of rare stylistic effectiveness from its wonderful compression, the infinite variety shown in the structure of clause and period, and the skillful use of poetic word and phrase.

CUSTOMS OF THE GERMANS¹

(Germania, XVI. - XXVII.)

THE Germans, it is well known, have no regular cities; nor do they allow a continuity of houses. They dwell in separate habitations, dispersed up and down as a grove, a meadow, or a fountain happens to invite. They have villages, but not with a series of connected buildings. Every tenement stands detached, with a vacant piece of ground round it, either to prevent accidents by fire, or for want of skill in the art of building. They do not know the use of mortar or of tiles. They build with rude materials, regardless of beauty, order, and proportion. Particular parts are covered over with a kind of earth so smooth and shining that the natural veins have some resemblance to the lights and shades of painting. Besides these habitations they have a number of subterranean caves, dug by their own labor and carefully covered over with dung: in winter their retreat from cold and the repository of their corn. In those recesses they not only find a shelter from the rigor of the season, but in times of foreign invasion their effects are safely concealed. The enemy lays waste the open country, but the hidden treasure escapes the general ravage; safe in its obscurity, or because the search would be attended with too much trouble.

The clothing in use is a loose mantle, made fast with a clasp, or, when that cannot be had, with a thorn. With only this on they loiter away whole days by the fire-side. The rich wear a more pretentious garment, not however displayed and flowing like the Parthians or the people of Sarmatia, but drawn so tight that the form of the limbs is palpably expressed. The skins of wild animals are also much in use. Near the frontier, on the borders of the Rhine, the inhabitants wear them, but are wholly indifferent as to the choice. The people who live in the more remote regions near the northern seas, and who have not acquired by commerce a taste for new-fashioned apparel, are more careful in their selection. They choose particular beasts, and having stripped off the furs clothe themselves with the spoil, decorated with parti-colored spots, or fragments taken from the skins of fish that swim the ocean as yet unexplored by the Romans. In point of dress there is no distinction between the sexes, except that the garment of the women is frequently made of linen, adorned with purple spots, but without sleeves, leaving the arms and part of the bosom uncovered.

¹ This and the following selections are from the translation of Arthur Murphy.

Marriage is considered as a strict and sacred institution. In the national character there is nothing so truly commendable. To be contented with one wife is peculiar to the Germans. They differ in this respect from all other savage nations. There are indeed a few instances of polygamy; not however the effect of loose desire, but occasioned by the ambition of various families, who court the alliance of a chief distinguished by the nobility of his rank and character. The bride brings no portion, but receives a dowry from her husband. In the presence of her parents and relations he makes a tender of part of his wealth; if accepted, the match is approved. In the choice of the presents female vanity is not consulted. There are no frivolous trinkets to adorn the future bride. The whole

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

as a subject of raillery, nor is the profligacy of corrupting and being corrupted called the fashion of the age. By the practice of some states,¹ female virtue is advanced to still higher perfection: with them none but virgins marry. When the bride has fixed her choice, her hopes of matrimony are closed for life. With one husband, as with one life, one mind, one body, every woman is satisfied. In him her happiness is centred, her desires find their limit, and the result is not only affection for the husband's person, but reverence for the married state. To set limits to population by rearing up only a certain number of children, and destroying the rest, is accounted a flagitious crime. Among the savages of Germany virtuous manners operate more than good laws in other countries.

In every family the children are reared in filth. They run about naked, and in time grow up to that strength and size of limb which we behold with wonder. The infant is nourished at the mother's breast, not turned over to nurses and to servants. No distinction is made between the future chieftain and the infant son of a common slave. On the same ground and mixed with the same cattle they pass their days, till the age of manhood draws the line of separation, and early valor shows the person of free birth. It is generally late before their young men come to manhood, nor are the virgins married too soon. Both parties wait to attain their full growth. In due time the match is made, and the children of the marriage have the constitution of their parents. The uncle by the mother's side regards his nephews with an affection not at all inferior to that of their father. With some

¹ I. e. German states.

the relation of the sister's children to their maternal uncle is held to be the strongest tie of consanguinity, so that in demanding hostages that line of kindred is preferred as the most endearing objects of the family and, consequently, the most tender pledges. The son is always heir to his father. Last wills and testaments are not in use. In case of failure of issue, the brothers of the deceased are next in succession, or else the paternal or maternal uncles. A numerous train of relations is the comfort and honor of old age. To live without raising heirs to yourself is no advantage in Germany.

To adopt the quarrels as well as the friendships of your parents and relations is held to be an indispensable duty. In their resentments, however, they are not implacable. Injuries are adjusted by a settled measure of compensation. Atonement is made for homicide by a certain number of cattle, and by that satisfaction the whole family is appeased; a happy regulation and conducive to the public interest, since it serves to curb that spirit of revenge which is the natural result of liberty in the excess. Hospitality and convivial pleasure are nowhere else so liberally enjoyed. To refuse admittance to a guest were an outrage against humanity. The master of the house welcomes every stranger, and regales him to the best of his ability. If his stock falls short, he becomes a visitor to his neighbor, and conducts his new acquaintance to a more plentiful table. They do not wait to be invited, nor is this of any consequence, since a cordial reception is always certain. Between an intimate and an entire stranger no distinction is made. The law of hospitality is the same. The departing guest receives as a present whatever he desires, and the host retaliates by asking with the same freedom. A German delights in the gifts which he receives, yet by bestowing he imputes nothing to you as a favor, and for what he receives he acknowledges no obligation.

In this manner the Germans pride themselves on their frankness and generosity. Their hours of rest are protracted to broad daylight. As soon as they rise, they bathe, generally, on account of the intense severity of the climate, in warm water. They then betake themselves to their meal, each on a separate seat and at his own table. Having finished their repast they proceed completely armed to the despatch of business, and frequently to a convivial meeting. To devote both day and night to deep drinking is a disgrace to no man. Disputes, as will be the case with people in liquor, frequently arise, and are seldom confined to opprobrious language. The quarrel generally ends in a scene of blood. Important subjects, such as the reconciliation of enemies, the forming of family alliances, the election of chiefs, and even peace and war, are generally canvassed in their carousing festivals. The convivial moment, according to their notion, is the true season for business, when the mind opens itself in plain simplicity, or grows warm with bold and noble ideas. Strangers to artifice and knowing no refinement, they tell their sentiments without disguise. The pleasure of the table expands their hearts and calls forth every secret. On the following day the subject of debate is again taken into consideration, and thus two different periods of time have their distinct uses: when warm, they debate; when cool, they decide.

Their beverage is a liquor drawn from barley or

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

by success at play ; he is ashamed of his victory, and therefore puts away the remembrance of it as soon as possible.

The slaves in general are not arranged at their several employments in the household affairs, as is the practice at Rome. Each has his separate habitation, and his own establishment to manage. The master considers him as an agrarian dependent, who is obliged to furnish a certain quantity of grain, cattle, or wearing apparel. The slave obeys, and the state of servitude extends no further. All domestic affairs are managed by the master's wife and children. To punish a slave with stripes, to load him with chains or condemn him to hard labor is unusual. It is true that slaves are sometimes put to death, not under color of justice, or of any authority vested in the master, but in transport of passion, in a fit of rage, as is often the case in a sudden affray ; but it is also true that this species of homicide passes with impunity. The freedmen are not of much higher consideration than the actual slaves ; they obtain no rank in the master's family, and, if we except the parts of Germany where monarchy is established, they never figure on the stage of public business. In despotic governments they rise above the men of ingenuous birth, and even eclipse the whole body of the nobles. In other states the subordination of the freedmen is a proof of public liberty.

The practice of placing money at interest and reaping the profits of usury is unknown in Germany ; and that happy ignorance is a better preventive of the evil than a code of prohibitory laws. In cultivating the soil they do not settle on one spot, but shift from place to place. The state or community takes possession of a certain tract proportioned to its number of hands ; allotments are afterwards made to individuals according to their rank and dignity. In so extensive a country, where there is no want of land, the partition is easily made. The ground tilled in one year lies fallow the next, and a sufficient quantity always remains, the labor of the people being by no means adequate to the extent or fertility of the soil. Nor have they the skill to make orchard plantations, to enclose the meadow grounds, or to lay out and water gardens. From the earth they demand nothing but grain. Hence their year is not, as with the Romans, divided into four seasons. They have distinct ideas of winter, spring, and summer, and their language has terms for each ; but they neither know the blessings nor the name of autumn.

Their funerals have neither pomp nor vain ambition. When the bodies of illustrious men are to be burned, they choose a particular kind of wood for the purpose, and have no other attention. The funeral pile is neither strewed with garments nor enriched with fragrant spices. The arms of the deceased are committed to the flames, and sometimes his horse. A mound of turf is raised to his memory ; and this, in their opinion, is a better sepulchre than those structures of labored grandeur which display the weakness of human vanity, and are at best a burden to the dead. Tears and lamentations are soon at an end, but their regret does not so easily wear away. To grieve for the departed is comely in the softer sex. The women weep for their friends ; the men remember them.

THE MUTINY OF THE PANNONIAN LEGIONS¹

(Annales, I., 16-30.)

SUCH was the situation of affairs at Rome when a fierce and violent mutiny broke out among the legions in Pannonia. For this insurrection there was no other motive than the licentious spirit which is apt to show itself in the beginning of a new reign, and the hope of private advantage in the distractions of a civil war. A summer camp had been formed for three legions² under the command of Junius Blaesus. The death of Augustus and the accession of Tiberius being known to the army, the general granted a suspension of military duty as an interval of grief or joy. The soldiers grew wanton in idleness; dissensions spread amongst them; the vile and profligate had their circles of auditors; sloth and pleasure prevailed; and all were willing to exchange a life of toil and discipline for repose and luxury. There happened to be in a camp a busy incendiary, by name Percennius, formerly a leader of theatrical factions,³ and now a common soldier; a man fluent in words, and by his early habits versed in the arts of exciting tumults and sedition. Over the weak and ignorant, and such as felt their minds alarmed with doubts and fears about the future condition of the service, this meddlesome fellow began to exert his ¹ Pannonia, which lay between the Danube and the Alps, had been organized as a province in the reign of Augustus. There were three Roman legions posted there. The mutiny took place just after Tiberius' accession, 14 A. D.

² The strength of a legion was from 5000 to 6000 men. It was commanded by a legatus, under whom were the tribunes, six in number, and under them the centurions.

³ A leader of claqueurs in the theatre.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

of punishment. But blows and stripes from our officers, wounds from the enemy, intense cold in winter and the fatigue of summer campaigns, destructive war, in which everything is hazarded, and peace, by which nothing is gained, are all the soldier's portion.

“For these evils there is but one remedy left. Let us fix the conditions of our service; let every soldier receive a *denarius*¹ a day, and at the end of sixteen years let him be entitled to his discharge; beyond that term no further service. Without detaining any man whatever, and without forcing him to follow the colors as a veteran, let every soldier receive the arrears that may be due to him; let him be paid in ready money on the spot, and in the very camp where he signalized his valor. The praetorian cohorts² receive two denarii for their daily pay; at the end of sixteen years they return to their families. Is superior merit the ground of this distinction? Do they encounter greater dangers? It is theirs to mount guard within the city, and the service may be honorable; but it is our lot to serve amidst savage nations in a state of perpetual warfare. If we look out of our tents the barbarians are in view.”

This speech was received with acclamations. Various passions heaved in every breast. Some presented their bodies seamed with stripes; others pointed to their heads grown gray in the service; numbers showed their tattered clothing, and their persons almost naked. At length the frenzy of the malcontents knew no bounds. Their first design was to incorporate the three legions into one; but which should give its name to the united body was the question. Mutual jealousy put an end to the project. Another plan was carried out: the eagles of the three legions, with the colors of the cohorts, were crowded together without preference or distinction. They threw up sods of earth, and began to raise a tribunal. Amidst the tumult Blaesus arrived. He called aloud to all, laid hold of individuals, offered himself to their swords. "Here," he said, "behold your victim; imbrue your hands in the blood of your general. Murder is a crime less horrible than treason to your prince. I will either live to command the legions intrusted to me; or, if you are determined to revolt, despatch me first, that, when the frenzy is over, you may wake to shame, horror, and remorse."

¹ About twenty cents.

² The Praetorian Guard, numbering about 10,000 men, and kept in the neighborhood of Rome.

The work of raising a tribunal, in spite of all his efforts, still went on. Heaps of turf were thrown up, and rose breast high. Conquered at length by the perseverance of their general, the mutineers desisted. Blaesus exerted all his eloquence: "Sedition and revolt," he said, "could not serve the cause; the remonstrances of the army ought to be conveyed to the ear of the prince with respect and deference. The demands which they now made were new, unknown to former armies, and with the deified Augustus never attempted. In the present juncture, when the prince had just undertaken the cares of government, was that a time to add to his solicitude by tumult and insurrection? If they would still persist, in the season of profound peace, to urge a claim never demanded even by the conquerors in a civil war, why incur the guilt of rebellion? Why, in violation of all military discipline, urge their pretensions sword in hand? They might depute their agent to treat with the prince, and, in the presence of their general, give their instructions on the spot." This proposal was accepted: with one voice they called for the son of Blaesus, then a military tribune. The young officer undertook the charge. His directions were to insist that at the expiration of sixteen years the soldier should be discharged from the service. That point settled, it then would be time to enumerate other grievances. With this commission the general's son went forward on his journey. A calm succeeded, and lasted for some days. But the minds of the soldiers were still in agitation: their pride was roused; the general's son was now the orator of the army; and force, it was manifest, had at length extorted what by gentle measures could never have been obtained.

Meanwhile the detached companies, which before the disturbance had been sent to Nauportum, having heard of the commotion in the camp, seized the colors, and, after ravaging the adjacent villages, plundered Nauportum, a place little inferior to a municipal town. They treated the centurions with derision, from derision proceeded to opprobrious language, and in the end to blows and open violence. Aufidienus Rufus, the prefect of the camp,¹ was the chief object of their fury: they dragged him out of his carriage; and, laying a heavy load on his back, obliged him to march in the foremost ranks, asking him with contemptuous insolence how he liked his burden and the length of his journey. Rufus had risen from a common soldier to the rank of centurion, and was afterwards made prefect of the camp. In that station he endeavored to recall the rigor of ancient discipline. A veteran in the service and long inured to fatigue,

His duties resembled those of a quartermaster.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

the multitude, all wild with fury, and eager to hear the language of sedition. "My friends," he said, "you have bravely interposed to save the lives of these innocent, these much-injured men; you have restored them to new life; but who will restore my brother? Who will give him to my arms? Sent hither from the German army, in concert with you to settle measures for our common safety, he was last night basely murdered by the hand of gladiators¹ whom Blaesus arms for your destruction. Answer me, Blaesus, where have you bestowed the body? The very enemy allows the rites of sepulture. When I have washed my brother with my tears, and printed kisses on his mangled body, then plunge your poniard in this wretched bosom. I shall die content, if these my fellow-soldiers perform the last funeral office, and bury in one grave two wretched victims, who knew no crime but that of serving the common interest of the legions."

This speech Vibulenus rendered still more inflammatory by the vehemence of his manner, by beating his breast, by striking his forehead, and pouring a flood of tears. A way being opened through the crowd, he leaped from the men's shoulders, and groveling at the feet of individuals, excited the passions of the multitude to the highest pitch of frenzy. In their fury some fell on the gladiators retained by Blaesus, and loaded them with irons; others seized the general's domestic train, while numbers dispersed themselves on every side in quest of the body; and if it had not been speedily known that no corpse could be found, that the slaves of Blaesus averred under the torture that no murder had been committed, and, in fact, that the incendiary never had a brother, Blaesus must have fallen a sacrifice. The tribunes and the prefect of the army were obliged to save themselves by flight. Their baggage was seized and plundered. Lucilius the centurion was put to death. This man, by the sarcastic pleasantry of the soldiers, had been nicknamed, "Give me another;" because, in chastising the soldiers, when one rod was broken, he used to call for "Another," and then "Another." The rest of the centurions lay concealed. Out of the whole number, Julius Clemens, a man of promptness and energy, was the favorite of the insurgents. He was spared as a fit person to negotiate the claims of the army. Two of the legions, the eighth and the fifteenth, were on the point of coming to the decision of the sword: the former bent on the destruction of Sirpicus, a centurion, and the latter determined to protect him. The quarrel would have resulted in a scene of blood, if the soldiers of the ninth legion had not, by entreaties or menaces, appeased the fury of both parties.

¹ Slaves trained as gladiators.

When the account of these transactions reached Tiberius, that abstruse and gloomy prince, who loved to brood in secret over all untoward events, was so deeply affected, that he resolved to despatch his son Drusus and other nobles, together with two praetorian cohorts, to quell the insurrection. In their instructions no decisive orders were given: they were left to act as emergencies might require. To the cohorts was added a select detachment, with a party of the praetorian horse, and the flower of the Germans, at that time the body-guard of the emperor. In the train which accompanied Drusus, Aelius Sejanus was appointed to guide the inexperience of the young prince. Sejanus,¹ at that time in a joint commission with his father Strabo, had the command of the praetorian bands, and stood high in favor with Tiberius. The army would of course consider him as the fountain of rewards and punishments. As soon as they approached the camp, the discontented legions, by way of doing honor to Drusus, advanced to meet him ; not, indeed, with colors displayed, as is usual on such occasions, but in deep and solemn silence, their dress neglected, and their whole appearance uncouth and sordid. In their looks was seen an air of dejection, and at the same time a sullen gloom, that plainly showed a spirit of mutiny still working in their hearts.

Drusus was no sooner within the entrenchments than the malcontents secured the gates. Sentinels were posted at different stations, while the rest gathered in a body round the tribunal. Drusus stood in act to speak, with his hand commanding silence. The soldiers felt a variety of contending passions : they looked around, and viewing their numbers grew fierce at the sight, rending the air with shouts and acclamations ; they turned to Drusus, and were covered with confusion. An indistinct and hollow murmur was heard, a general uproar followed, and soon afterwards a deep and awful silence. The behavior of the men varied with their passions, by turns inflamed with rage or depressed with fear. Drusus seized his moment, and read his father's letter, in substance stating that Tiberius had nothing so much at heart as the interest of the gallant legions with whom he had served in so many wars. As soon as his grief for the loss of Augustus allowed him leisure, it was his intention to

¹ Afterwards the emperor's confidential minister.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the tribunal, breathing vengeance, and wherever they met either men belonging to the praetorian bands, or friends of Drusus, they threatened violence, in hopes of ending the dispute by a sudden conflict. Gnaeus Lentulus, whose age and military character gave him considerable weight, was particularly obnoxious, he being regarded as the chief adviser of Drusus, and an enemy to the proceedings of the army. For the security of his person he went aside with Drusus, intending to repair to the winter camp. The mutineers gathered round him, demanding, with insolence, "Which way was he going? to the senate? perhaps to the emperor? Was he there to show himself an enemy to the demands of the legion?" Nothing could restrain their fury. They discharged a volley of stones, and Lentulus, wounded and covered with blood, had nothing to expect but instant death, when the guards that attended Drusus came up in time, and rescued him from destruction.

The night that followed seemed big with some fatal disaster, when an unexpected phenomenon put an end to the commotion. In a clear and serene sky the moon was suddenly eclipsed. This appearance, its natural cause not being understood by the soldiers, was deemed a prognostic announcing the fate of the army. The planet in its languishing state represented the condition of the legions; if it recovered its former lustre, the efforts of the men would be crowned with success. To assist the moon in her labors, the air resounded with the clangor of brazen instruments, with the sound of trumpets, and other warlike music. The crowd in the mean time stood at gaze. Every gleam of light inspired the men with joy, and the sudden gloom depressed their hearts with grief. The clouds condensed, and the moon was supposed to be lost in utter darkness. A melancholy horror seized the multitude, and melancholy is sure to engender superstition. A religious panic spread through the army. The appearance in the heavens foretold eternal labor to the legions, and all lamented that by their crimes they had called down on themselves the indignation of the gods. Drusus took advantage of the moment. The opportunity was the effect of chance, but, rightly managed, might conduce to the wisest purpose.

He gave orders that the men who by honest means were most in credit with the malcontents should go round from tent to tent. Among these was Clemens the centurion. They visited every part of the camp, applied to the guards on duty, conversed with the patrol, and mixed with the sentinels at the gates. They allured some by promises, and by terror subdued the spirit of others. "How long shall we besiege the son of the emperor? Where will this confusion end? Must we follow Percennius and Vibulenus? And shall we swear fidelity to those new commanders? Will their funds supply the pay of the legions? Have they lands to assign to the veteran soldier? For them shall the Neros and the Drusi be deposed? Are they to mount the vacant throne, the future sovereigns of Rome? Let us, since we were the last to enter into rebellion, be the first to expiate our guilt by well-timed repentance. Demands in favor of all proceed but slowly; to individuals indulgence is more easily granted; deserve it separately, and the reward will follow." This reasoning had its effect. Suspicion and mutual distrust began to arise; the soldiers recently recruited went apart from the veterans;

the legions separated ; a sense of duty revived in the breasts of all ; the gates were no longer guarded ; and the colors, at first promiscuously crowded together, were restored to their proper stations.

At the return of day Drusus called an assembly of the soldiers. Though unused to public speaking, he delivered himself with the eloquence of a man who felt his own importance and the dignity of his rank. He condemned the past, and applauded the present. It was not, he said, a part of his character to yield to menaces, or to shrink from danger. If he saw them penitent, if he heard the language of remorse, he would make a report in their favor, and dispose his father to listen to their petition. The soldiers answered in humble terms. At their request the younger Blaesus, mentioned above, with Lucius Apronius, a Roman knight in the train of Drusus, and Justus Catonius, a centurion of the first rank, were despatched as the delegates of the army. In the councils afterwards held by Drusus various opinions were entertained, and different measures proposed. To wait the return of the deputies, and meanwhile to win the affections of the men by moderation, was the advice of many : others were for immediate coercion. " Lenity," they said, " makes no impression on the vulgar herd. Common soldiers, when not kept in subjection, are fierce and turbulent, yet ever ready to bend and crouch under proper authority. It was now the time, while they were overwhelmed with superstition, to infuse another fear, and teach them to respect their general. The authors of the late sedition ought to be made a public example." Drusus, by the bent of his nature prone to vindictive measures, desired that Percennius and Vibulenus should be brought before him. By his

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

THE GREAT FIRE AT ROME¹

(Annales, XV, 38–44.)

A DREADFUL calamity followed a short time afterwards, by some ascribed to chance, by others to the execrable wickedness of Nero. There is authority of historians on both sides, and which preponderates it is not easy to determine. It is, however, certain, that of all the disasters that ever befell the city of Rome from fire, this was the worst, the most violent and the most destructive. The flames broke out in that part of the circus which adjoins on one side the Palatine hill, and on the other the Caelian. It caught a number of shops stored with combustible goods, and gathering force from the winds spread with rapidity from one end of the circus to the other. Neither the thick walls of houses, nor the inclosure of temples, nor any other building could check the rapid progress of the flames. A dreadful conflagration followed. The level parts of the city were destroyed. The fire reached the higher buildings, and again laying hold of lower places spread with a degree of velocity that nothing could resist. The form of the streets, long and narrow, with frequent windings and no regular opening, contributed to increase the mischief. The shrieks and lamentations of women, the infirmities of age, and the weakness of the young and tender added misery to the dreadful scene. Some endeavored to provide for themselves, others to save their friends, in one part dragging along the lame and impotent, in another waiting to receive the tardy, or expecting relief themselves. They hurried, they lingered, they obstructed one another. They looked behind, and the fire broke out in front; they escaped from the flames, and in their place of refuge found no safety. The fire raged in every quarter; all were involved in one general conflagration.

¹ 64 A. D.

The unhappy wretches fled to places remote and thought themselves secure, but soon perceived the flames raging round them. Which way to turn, what to avoid or what to seek, no one could tell. Some fell prostrate on the ground; others lay stretched in the fields, in consternation and dismay resigned to their fate. Numbers lost their whole substance, even the tools and implements by which they gained their livelihood, and, in that distress, did not wish to survive. Many, wild with affliction for their friends and relations whom they could not save, embraced a voluntary death and perished in the flames. During the whole of this dismal scene no man dared to attempt anything that might check the violence of the dreadful calamity. A crew of incendiaries stood near at hand denouncing vengeance on all who offered to interfere. Some were so abandoned as to heap fuel on the flames. They threw in firebrands and flaming torches, proclaiming aloud that they had authority for what they did. Whether in fact they had received such horrible orders, or under that device meant to plunder with greater licentiousness, cannot now be known.

During the whole of this terrible conflagration Nero remained at Antium, without a thought of returning to the city, till the fire approached the building by which he had joined the gardens of Maecenas with the imperial palace. All help, however, was too late. The palace, the contiguous edifices, and every house adjoining were laid in ruins. To relieve the unhappy people, wandering in distress without a place of shelter, he opened the field of Mars, as well as the magnificent buildings raised by Agrippa, and even his own imperial gardens. He ordered a number of sheds to be thrown up with all possible despatch, for the use of the populace. Household utensils and all kinds of necessary implements were brought from Ostia and other cities in the neighborhood. The price of grain was reduced to three sesterces¹ a peck. For acts like these, munificent and well-timed, Nero might hope for a return of popular favor, but his expectations were in vain: no man was touched with gratitude. A report prevailed that, while the city was in a blaze, Nero went to his own theatre, and there, mounting the stage, sang the destruction of Troy, as a happy allusion to the present misfortune.

On the sixth day the fire was subdued at the foot of the Esquiline hill. This was effected by demolishing a number of buildings, and thereby leaving a wide space, where for want of materials the flame expired. The minds of men had scarce begun to recover from their consternation when the fire broke out a second time with no less fury than before. This happened, however, in a more open quarter, where fewer lives were lost; but the temples of the gods, the porticos and buildings raised for the decoration of the city, were levelled to the ground. The popular odium was now more inflamed than ever, as this second alarm began in the house of Tigellinus,² formerly the mansion of Aemilius. A suspicion prevailed that to build a new city and give it his own name was the ambi-

¹ Twelve cents.

² A favorite of Nero.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

were neither gold nor precious stones. Those decorations, long since introduced by luxury, were grown stale and hackneyed to the eye. A different species of magnificence was now consulted: expansive lakes and fields of vast extent were intermixed with pleasing variety; woods and forests stretched to an immeasurable length, presenting gloom and solitude amidst scenes of open space, where the eye wandered with surprise over an unbounded prospect. This prodigious plan was carried out under the direction of two surveyors, whose names were Severus and Celer. Bold and original in their projects, these men undertook to conquer nature, and to perform wonders even beyond the imagination and the riches of the prince. They promised to form a navigable canal from Lake Avernus to the mouth of the Tiber. The experiment, like the genius of the men, was bold and grand. The canal was to be made through a long tract of barren land, and in some places through opposing mountains. The country round was parched and dry, without one humid spot, except the Pomptinian marsh, from which water could be expected. A scheme so vast could not be accomplished without immoderate labor, and, if practicable, the end was in no proportion to the expense and labor. But the prodigious and almost impossible had charms for the enterprising spirit of Nero. He began to hew a passage through the hills that surround Lake Avernus, and some traces of his deluded hopes are visible at this day.

The ground which, after marking out his own domain, Nero left to the public, was not laid out for the new city in a hurry and without judgment, as was the case after the irruption of the Gauls. A regular plan was formed: the streets were made wide and long;

the elevation of the houses was defined, with an open area before the doors, and porticos to secure and adorn the front. The expense of the porticos Nero undertook to defray out of his own revenue. He promised, besides, as soon as the work was finished, to clear the ground, and leave a clear space to every house, without any charge to the occupant. In order to excite a spirit of industry and emulation, he offered rewards proportioned to the rank of each individual, provided the buildings were finished in a limited time. The rubbish was removed by his order to the marshes of Ostia, and the ships that brought corn up the river were to return loaded with the refuse of the workmen. Besides all this the houses, built on a new principle, were to be raised to a certain elevation, without beams or woodwork, on arches of stone from the quarries of Alba or Gabii, those materials being impervious, and of a nature to resist the force of fire. The springs of water, which had been before that time intercepted by individuals for their separate use, were no longer suffered to be diverted from their channel, but left to the care of commissioners, that the public might be properly supplied, and in case of fire have a reservoir at hand to stop the progress of the mischief.

It was also settled that the houses should no longer be contiguous, with slight party-walls to divide them, but that every house should stand detached, surrounded and insulated by its own inclosure. These regulations, it must be admitted, were of public utility, and added much to the embellishment of the new city. But still the old plan of Rome was not without its advocates. It was thought more conducive to the health of the inhabitants. The narrowness of the streets and the elevation of the buildings served to exclude the rays of the sun, whereas the more open space, having neither shade nor shelter, left men exposed to the intense heat of the day.

These several regulations were, no doubt, the best that human wisdom could suggest. The next care was to propitiate the gods. The Sibylline Books¹ were consulted, and the consequence was that supplications were decreed to Vulcan, to Ceres, and to Proserpine. A band of matrons offered their prayers and sacrifices to Juno, first in the Capitol, and next on the nearest margin of the sea, where they supplied themselves with water to sprinkle the temple and the statue of the goddess. A select number of women, who had husbands actually living, laid the deities on their sacred beds,² and kept midnight vigils with the usual solemnity. But neither these religious ceremonies nor the liberal donations of the prince could efface from the minds of men the prevailing opinion that Rome was set on fire by his own orders. The infamy of that horrible transaction still adhered to him. In order if possible to remove the imputation, he determined to transfer the guilt to others. For this purpose he punished with exquisite cruelty a race of men detested for their evil practices, by vulgar appellation commonly called Christians.

The name was derived from Christ, who in the reign of Tiberius suffered under Pontius Pilate, the proeurator of Judea. By that event the sect of which he was the founder received a blow which for a time

¹ A collection of oracles in Greek hexameters that had been brought to Rome in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus.

² This was the ceremony of the lectisternum, in which images of gods were laid upon couches, a table with food being placed beside them.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

JUVENAL

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

THE paucity and meagreness of the traditions that have come down to us about the life of Juvenal preclude the possibility of anything but an extremely flimsy reconstruction of it. He lived during the last half of the first century of our era and the first part of the second, various activities, if we are to believe the ancient accounts, filling up his long life. He is said to have seen some military service, to have held certain municipal offices in Aquinum in Latium, presumably his native town, to have turned to the writing of satire only after spending many years in the practice of declamation, and finally in his eightieth year to have been banished to Egypt, under the pretext of a military command, as a penalty for having in one of his satires reflected upon an actor who was a favorite at court.

He has left us sixteen satires, some of them on general moral themes, but the majority satirizing conditions or tendencies in society at Rome. In some cases he handles the same topics as Martial, but instead of Martial's flippant light-heartedness we find bitterness and indignation, expressed with a rush of rhetoric and a mordancy of phrase that make them unique even in this kind of writing. His sincerity has often been impeached; but, while conceding that many passages are marred by exaggeration, and that in the heat of declamation the feeling is not infrequently forced, it seems probable that his work was for the most part based on genuine convictions. However this may be, there can be no question as to the brilliancy of his rhetoric, the effectiveness of his sententiae, and his powers of vivid portrayal and word painting. His canvas is crowded with realistic pictures of Roman life: as, for example, the swarm of toga-clad clients besieging the door of a rich patron at dawn, some of them not having even the excuse of poverty, others looking to the dole as their only means of subsistence, and to procure it resorting freely to lying and impersonation, and all the devices of shifty poverty; the scenes in the streets at Rome on the downfall of Sejanus; the crowded tenements whose shoddy construction offered to their occupants at best an option between collapse and conflagration; the legacy hunters, forgers, rioters, highwaymen, debauchees, adulterers, — all characters old to satire, it is true, but never placed before in so fierce a light.

ROME ¹

(III.)

GRIEVED though I am to see the man depart,
 Who long has shared, and still must share, my heart,
 Yet (when I call my better judgment home)
 I praise his purpose to retire from Rome,
 And give, on Cumae's ² solitary coast,
 The Sibyl — one inhabitant to boast!

Full on the road to Baiae, Cumae lies,
 And many a sweet retreat her shore supplies —
 Though I prefer ev'n Prochyta's ³ bare strand

¹ This satire contains an account of the evils and discomforts of life in Rome. The speaker (vv. 37 to end) is one Umbricius, who is leaving the capital in disgust. Juvenal represents himself (vv. 1-36) as having accompanied him to the valley of Egeria, just beyond one of the city gates, to say good-by ² On the coast of Campania, the dwelling-place of the famous Sibyl, priestess of Apollo.

³ A small island off the coast of Campania.

To the Subura¹ — for, what desert land, 10
 What wild, uncultured spot, can more affright
 Than fires wide blazing through the gloom of night,
 Houses with ceaseless ruin thundering down,
 And all the horrors of this hateful town?
 Where poets, while the dog-star glows, rehearse 15
 To gasping multitudes their barbarous verse!

Now had my friend, impatient to depart,
 Consigned his little all to one poor cart:
 For this without the town he chose to wait;
 But stopped a moment at the Conduit-gate.² 20
 Here Numa³ erst his nightly visits paid,
 And held high converse with the Egerian maid:
 Now the once-hallowed fountain, grove, and fane
 Are let to Jews, a wretched, wandering train,
 Whose furniture's a basket filled with hay — 25
 For every tree is forced a tax to pay;
 And while the heaven-born Nine in exile rove,
 The beggar rents their consecrated grove!

Thence slowly winding down the vale, we view
 The Egerian grotts — ah, how unlike the true! 30
 Nymph of the Spring, more honored hadst thou been,
 If, free from art, an edge of living green
 Thy bubbling fount had circumscribed alone,
 And marble ne'er profaned the native stone.

Umbricius here his sullen silence broke, 35
 And turned on Rome, indignant, as he spoke.
 Since virtue droops, he cried, without regard,
 And honest toil scarce hopes a poor reward;
 Since every morrow sees my means decay,

¹ A densely populated district of Rome.

² The Porta Capena, in the southeast part of the city. The Marcian aqueduct passed over it.

³ The second king of Rome, who was said to have received instruction from the nymph Egeria.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

To read the stars ; I neither can, nor will, 70
 Presage a father's death ; I never pried
 In toads for poison, nor — in aught beside.
 Others may aid the adulterer's vile design,
 And bear the insidious gift and melting line,
 Seduction's agents ! I such deeds detest ; 75
 And, honest, let no thief partake my breast.
 For this without a friend, the world I quit,
 A palsied limb, for every use unfit.

Who now is loved, but he whose conscious breast
 Swells with dark deeds, still, still to be supprest ? 80
 He pays, he owes, thee nothing (strictly just),
 Who gives an honest secret to thy trust ;
 But, a dishonest ! — there, he feels thy power,
 And buys thy friendship high from hour to hour.
 But let not all the wealth which Tagus pours 85
 In Ocean's lap, not all his glittering stores,
 Be deemed a bribe sufficient to requite
 The loss of peace by day, of sleep by night : —
 Oh take not, take not what thy soul rejects,
 Nor sell the faith which he who buys suspects ! 90
 The nation, by the great admired, carest,
 And hated, shunned by me above the rest,
 No longer now restrained by wounded pride,
 I haste to show (nor thou my warmth deride)
 I cannot rule my spleen, and calmly see 95
 A Grecian capital in Italy !
 Grecian ? O no ! with this vast sewer compared,
 The dregs of Greece are scarcely worth regard :
 Long since, the stream that wanton Syria laves
 Has disembogued its filth in Tiber's waves, 100
 Its language, arts ; o'erwhelmed us with the scum
 Of Antioch's streets, its minstrel, harp, and drum.
 Hie to the Circus ! ye who pant to prove

A barbarous mistress, an outlandish love ;
 Hie to the Circus ! there in crowds they stand, 105
 Tires on their head and timbrels in their hand.

Thy rustic, Mars, the trechedipna¹ wears,
 And on his breast, smeared with ceroma,² bears
 A paltry prize, well pleased ; while every land,
 Sicyon, and Amydon, and Alaband, 110

Tralles, and Samos, and a thousand more,
 Thrive on his indolence, and daily pour
 Their starving myriads forth : hither they come,
 And batten on the genial soil of Rome ;
 Minions, then lords, of every princely dome ! 115

A flattering, cringing, treacherous, artful race,
 Of torrent tongue, and never-blushing face ;
 A Protean³ tribe, one knows not what to call,
 Which shifts to every form, and shines in all :
 Grammarian, painter, augur, rhetorician, 120

Rope-dancer, conjurer, fiddler, and physician,
 All trades his own your hungry Greekling counts ;
 And bid him mount the sky — the sky he mounts !
 You smile — was 't a barbarian, then, that flew ?
 No, 't was a Greek ; 't was an Athenian,⁴ too ! 125

Bear with their state who will : for I disdain
 To feed their upstart pride, or swell their train :
 Slaves, that in Syrian lighters stowed so late
 With figs and prunes (an inauspicious freight),
 Already see their faith preferred to mine, 130

And sit above me ! and before me sign !⁵
 That on the Aventine⁶ I first drew air,

¹ Greek shoes.

² A mixture of wax, oil, and clay.

³ Like Proteus, able to assume different forms.

⁴ Daedalus.

⁵ Take a higher place at dinner, and have precedence in signing a document.

⁶ One of the hills of Rome.

And from the womb was nursed on Sabine fare,
 Avails me not! our birthright now is lost,
 And all our privilege an empty boast! 135

For lo! where versed in every soothing art
 The wily Greek assails his patron's heart,
 Finds in each dull harangue an air, a grace,
 And all Adonis in a Gorgon face;
 Admires the voice that grates upon the ear, 140
 Like the shrill scream of amorous chanticleer;
 And equals the crane neck and narrow chest
 To Hercules, when, straining to his breast
 The giant son¹ of Earth, his every vein
 Swells with the toil and more than mortal pain. 145

We too can cringe as low, and praise as warm,
 But flattery from the Greeks alone can charm.
 No longer now the favorites of the stage
 Boast their exclusive power to charm the age:
 The happy art with them a nation shares, 150
 Greece is a theatre, where all are players.
 For lo! their patron smiles, — they burst with mirth;
 He weeps, — they droop, the saddest souls on earth;
 He calls for fire, — they court the mantle's heat;
 'T is warm, he cries, — and they dissolve in sweat. 155
 Ill-matched! — secure of victory they start,
 Who, taught from youth to play a borrowed part,
 Can with a glance the rising passion trace,
 And mould their own, to suit their patron's face;
 At deeds of shame their hands admiring raise, 160
 And mad debauchery's worst excesses praise.

Turn to their schools: yon gray professor see,
 Smear'd with the sanguine stains of perfidy!
 That tutor most accursed his pupil sold!
 That Stoic sacrificed his friend to gold! 165

¹ Antaeus, who lost his strength when lifted from the earth.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Of Numa, or of him ¹ whose zeal divine
 Snatched pale Minerva from her blazing shrine :
 To search his rent-roll first the bench prepares,
 His honesty employs their latest cares : 195
 What table does he keep, what slaves maintain,
 And what, they ask, and where, is his domain ?
 These weighty matters known, his fate they rate,
 And square his probity to his estate.
 The poor may swear by all the immortal Powers, 200
 By the Great Gods of Samothrace,² and ours.
 His oaths are false, they cry, he scoffs at heaven
 And all its thunders, scoffs — and is forgiven !
 Add that the wretch is still the theme of scorn,
 If the soiled cloak be patched, the gown o'erworn ; 205
 If through the bursting shoe the foot be seen,
 Or the coarse seam tell where the rent has been.
 O Poverty, thy thousand ills combined
 Sink not so deep into the generous mind,
 As the contempt and laughter of mankind ! 210
 “ Up ! up ! these cushioned benches,” Lectins ³ cries,
 “ Befit not your estates : for shame ! arise.”
 For “ shame ! ” — but you say well : the pander's heir,
 The spawn of bulks and stews, is seated there ;
 The crier's spruce son, fresh from the fencer's school, 215
 And prompt the taste to settle and to rule.
 So Otho ⁴ fixed it, whose preposterous pride
 First dared to chase us from their Honors' side.

¹ L. Caecilius Metellus, who rescued the statue of Minerva when the temple of Vesta was burned.

² A small island in the northern Aegean, the seat of the mystic worship of the Cabiri.

³ Some official of the games, who ejects poor citizens from the seats reserved for members of the equestrian order.

⁴ The law which reserved the first fourteen rows in the theatre for the equestrian order had been proposed by Roscius Otho in 67 B. C.

In these cursed walls, devote alone to gain,
 When do the poor a wealthy wife obtain? 220
 When are they named in wills? When called to share
 The aedile's¹ council, and assist the chair?
 Long since should they have risen, thus slighted,
 spurned,

And left their home, but — not to have returned!

Depressed by indigence, the good and wise 225
 In every clime by painful efforts rise;
 Here by more painful still, where scanty cheer,
 Poor lodging, mean attendance — all is dear.
 In earthenware he seorns at Rome to eat,
 Who, called abruptly to the Marsian's² seat, 230
 From such well pleased would take his simple food,
 Nor blush to wear the cheap Venetian hood.

There's many a part of Italy, 't is said,
 Where none assume the toga but the dead:
 There, when the toil foregone and annual play 235
 Mark from the rest some high and solemn day,
 To theatres of turf the rustics throng,
 Charmed with the farce that charmed their sires so long;

While the pale infant, of the mask³ in dread,
 Hides in his mother's breast his little head. 240
 No modes of dress high birth distinguish there;
 All ranks, all orders, the same habit wear,
 And the dread aedile's dignity is known,
 O sacred badge! by his white garb alone.
 But here, beyond our power arrayed we go, 245
 In all the gay varieties of show;

¹ In his function as a police magistrate.

² The Marsi, whose country lay among the Apennines, east of Rome, were proverbial for the simplicity of their lives.

³ Masks were worn by the actors.

And when our purse supplies the charge no more,
 Borrow, unblushing, from our neighbor's store :
 Such is the reigning vice ; and so we flaunt,
 Proud in distress, and prodigal in want ! 250

Briefly, my friend, here all are slaves to gold,
 And words and smiles and everything is sold.
 What will you give for Cossus' ¹ nod ? How high
 The silent notice of Veiento ¹ buy ?

One favorite youth is shaved, another shorn ; 255
 And while to Jove the precious spoil is borne, Clients are taxed for offerings, and (yet more
 To gall their patience) from their little store
 Constrained to swell the minion's ample hoard,
 And bribe the page for leave to bribe his lord. 260

Who fears the crash ² of houses in retreat
 At simple Gabii, bleak Praeneste's seat,
 Volsinium's craggy heights, embowered in wood,
 Or Tibur, beetling o'er prone Anio's flood ?
 While half the city here by shores ³ is stayed, 265
 And feeble cramps, that lend a treacherous aid ;
 For thus the stewards patch the riven wall,
 Thus prop the mansion, tottering to its fall ;
 Then bid the tenant court secure repose,
 While the pile nods to every blast that blows. 270

O ! may I live where no such fears molest,
 No midnight fires burst on my hour of rest !
 For here 't is terror all ; mid the loud cry
 Of " water ! water ! " the scared neighbors fly,
 With all their haste can seize — the flames aspire, 275
 And the third floor is wrapt in smoke and fire,
 While you, unconscious, doze. Up, ho ! and know,

¹ Put for any rich patron.

² The large tenement houses, in which the majority of the people in Rome lived, not infrequently collapsed.

³ Props.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

The far-famed boast of Polyclete¹ and Greece ;
 This, ornaments which graced of old the fane
 Of Asia's gods ; that, figured plate and plain ; 310
 This, cases, books, and busts the shelves to grace,
 And piles of coin his specie to replace.

So much the childless Persian² swells his store,
 (Though deemed the richest of the rich before)
 That all ascribe the flames to thirst of pelf, 315
 And swear Asturius fired his house himself.

O, had you from the Circus³ power to fly,
 In many a halcyon village might you buy
 Some elegant retreat, for what will here
 Scarce hire a gloomy dungeon through the year ! 320
 There wells by nature formed, which need no rope,
 No laboring arm to crane their waters up,
 Around your lawn their facile streams shall shower,
 And cheer the springing plant and opening flower.
 There live delighted with the rustic's lot, 325
 And till with your own hands the little spot ;
 The little spot shall yield you large amends,
 And glad with many a feast your Samian friends.⁴
 And sure, in any corner we can get,
 To call one lizard ours is something yet ! 330

Flushed with a mass of undigested food,
 Which clods the stomach and inflames the blood,
 What crowds, with watching wearied and o'erprest,
 Curse the slow hours, and die for want of rest !
 For who can hope his languid lids to close, 335

¹ The famous Greek sculptor of the latter half of the fifth century B. C.

² Asturius.

³ Juvenal in more than one passage deplures the abnormal interest of the majority of Romans in the games of the circus.

⁴ Pythagoreans, who were vegetarians. Pythagoras was a native of Samos.

Where brawling taverns banish all repose?
 Sleep to the rich alone his visits pays,
 And hence the seeds of many a dire disease.
 The carts' loud rumbling through the narrow way,
 The drivers' clamors at each casual stay, 340
 From drowsy Drusus¹ would his slumber take,
 And keep the calves of Proteus² broad awake!

If business call, obsequious crowds divide,
 While o'er their heads the rich securely ride,
 By tall Illyrians³ borne, and read, or write, 345
 Or (should the early hour to rest invite)
 Close the soft litter, and enjoy the night.

Yet reach they first the goal; while, by the throng
 Elbowed and jostled, scarce we creep along Sharp strokes from poles, tubs, rafters, doomed to feel; 350

And plastered o'er with mud from head to heel;
 While the rude soldier gores us as he goes,
 Or marks in blood his progress on our toes!

See, from the dole,⁴ a vast tumultuous throng,
 Each followed by his kitchen, pours along! 355
 Huge pans, which Corbulo⁵ could scarce uprear,
 With steady neck a puny slave must bear,
 And, lest amid the way the flames⁶ expire,
 Glide nimbly on, and gliding fan the fire;
 Through the close press with sinuous efforts wind, 360
 And, piece by piece, leave his botched rags behind.

Hark! groaning on, the unwieldy wagon spreads

¹ The emperor Claudius, who was notoriously somnolent.

² A minor sea deity who tended the seals for Neptune.

³ Commonly used as litter-bearers.

⁴ The portion given by the patron to his client. It consisted either of food or of a small sum of money.

⁵ Some Roman strong man.

⁶ In the brazier which he carried to keep the food warm.

Its cumbrous load, tremendous ! o'er our heads,
 Projecting elm or pine, that nods on high,
 And threatens death to every passer-by. 365
 Heavens ! should the axle crack, which bears a weight
 Of huge Ligurian stone,¹ and pour the freight
 On the pale crowd beneath, what would remain,
 What joint, what bone, what atom of the slain ?
 The body, with the soul, would vanish quite, 370
 Invisible as air, to mortal sight !
 Meanwhile, unconscious of their fellow's fate,
 At home they heat the water, scour the plate,
 Arrange the strigils, fill the cruse with oil,
 And ply their several tasks with fruitless toil ; 375
 For he who bore the dole, poor mangled ghost,
 Sits pale and trembling on the Stygian coast,
 Scared at the horrors of the novel scene,
 At Charon's threatening voice and scowling mien ;
 Nor hopes a passage, thus abruptly hurled, 380
 Without his farthing,² to the nether world.

Pass we these fearful dangers, and survey
 What other evils threat our nightly way.
 And first behold the mansion's towering size,
 Where floors on floors to the tenth³ story rise ; 385
 Whence heedless garreteers their potsherds throw,
 And crush the unwary wretch that walks below !
 Clattering, the storm descends from heights unknown,
 Ploughs up the street, and wounds the flinty stone !
 'T is madness, dire improvidence of ill, 390
 To sup abroad, before you sign your will ;
 Since fate in ambush lies, and marks his prey,
 From every wakeful window in the way :

¹ Carrara marble.

² Charon's fee.

³ The translator exaggerates. Augustus limited the height of buildings in Rome to seventy feet.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Whether I strive some humble plea to frame,
 Or steal in silence by, 't is just the same ; 425
 I'm beaten first, then dragged in rage away ;
 Bound to the peace, or punished for the fray !

Mark here the boasted freedom of the poor !
 Beaten and bruised, that goodness to adore,
 Which at their humble prayer suspends its ire, 430
 And sends them home with yet a bone entire !

Nor this the worst ; for when deep midnight reigns,
 And bolts secure our doors, and massy chains,
 When noisy inns a transient silence keep,
 And harassed nature wooes the balm of sleep, 435
 Then thieves and murderers ply their dreadful trade.
 With stealthy steps our secret couch invade :
 Roused from the treacherous calm, aghast we start,
 And the flashed sword is buried in our heart !

Hither from bogs, from rocks, and caves pursued
 (The Pontine marsh and Gallinarian wood ¹), 441
 The dark assassins flock as to their home,
 And fill with dire alarms the streets of Rome.
 Such countless multitudes our peace annoy,
 That bolts and shackles every forge employ, 445
 And cause so wide a waste, the country fears
 A want of ore for mattocks, rakes, and shares.

O ! happy were our sires, estranged from crimes ;
 And happy, happy, were the good old times
 Which saw, beneath their kings', their tribunes' reign,
 One cell the nation's criminals contain ! 451

Much could I add, more reasons could I cite,
 If time were ours, to justify my flight ;
 But see ! the impatient team is moving on,
 The sun declining, and I must be gone. 455

¹ The Pontine marshes in Latium and the Gallinarian wood in Campania were infested by brigands

Long since the driver murmured at my stay,
And jerked his whip to beckon me away.
Farewell, my friend ! with this embrace we part !
Cherish my memory ever in your heart ;
And when from crowds and business you repair, 460
To breathe at your Aquinum freer air,
Fail not to draw me from my loved retreat
To Elvine Ceres, and Diana's seat :¹
For your bleak hills my Cumae I'll resign,
And (if you blush not at such aid as mine) 465
Come well equipped to wage in angry rhymes
Fierce war with you on follies and on crimes.

WILLIAM GIFFORD.

¹ There were temples of Ceres and of Diana at Aquinum. It has been suggested that the former was erected by a member of the Helvian gens, — hence the epithet.

PLINY THE YOUNGER

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

PLINY'S statement that he was in his eighteenth year at the time of the eruption of Vesuvius enables us to place his birth with certainty in 62 A. D. He was the nephew and adopted son of C. Plinius Secundus, the author of the Natural History, whose example undoubtedly did much to stimulate his literary ambitions. He studied rhetoric under Quintilian, and beginning the practice of law at an early age, soon became one of the leading advocates in Rome. He passed through the usual course of official honors, attaining the consulship in 100 under Trajan, and finally in 111 or 112 being appointed governor of Bithynia. He died about 114.

He published a number of speeches, some poems, and several books of letters. Of these one speech, the Panegyric on Trajan, and the Letters have survived. The Panegyric was delivered in the senate on the occasion of his election to the consulship, but was only published after careful revision. It is a conspicuous example of the florid type of oratory, shows many signs of studied elaboration, and is full of flattery of the emperor. Of much greater value and interest are the ten books of Letters, the first nine containing epistles on a great variety of subjects addressed to various friends, while the last is confined to correspondence with Trajan during Pliny's governorship of Bithynia. In the first group we have to deal with productions which were only ostensibly letters and which were written to be published, — each one dealing with a single theme,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

tion and jotting down notes, so that I might have full tablets to take home with me, even though my hands were empty. You need not shrug your shoulders at study under such conditions. It is really surprising how the mind is stimulated by bodily movement and exercise. I find the most powerful incentive to thought in having the woods all about me, in the solitude and the silence which is observed in hunting. So when next you go hunting, take my advice and carry your writing tablets with you as well as your luncheon basket and your flask. You will find that Minerva loves to wander on the mountains quite as much as Diana. Farewell.

TO SOSIUS SENECCIO

(I., 13.)

THIS year has brought us a fine crop of poets : right through April hardly a day passed without some recital¹ or other. I am delighted that literature is so flourishing and that men are giving such open proofs of brains, even though audiences are found so slow in coming together. People as a rule lounge in the squares and waste the time in gossip when they should be listening to the recital. They get some one to come and tell them whether the reciter has entered the hall yet, whether he has got through his introduction, or whether he has nearly reached the end of his reading. Not until then do they enter the room, and even then they come in slowly and languidly. Nor do they sit it out ; no, before the close of the recital they slip away, some sidling out so as not to attract attention, others rising openly and walking out bodily. And yet, by Hercules, our fathers tell a story of how Claudius Caesar one day while walking up and down in the palace, happened to hear some clapping of hands, and on inquiring the cause and being told that Nonianus was giving a reading, he suddenly joined the company to every one's surprise. But nowadays even those who have most time on their hands, after receiving early notices and frequent reminders, either fail to put in an appearance, or if they do come they complain that they have wasted a day just because they have not wasted it. All the more praise and credit, therefore, is due to those who do not allow their love of writing and reciting to be damped either by the laziness or the fastidiousness of their audiences. For my own part, I have hardly ever failed to attend. True, the authors are mostly my friends, for almost all the literary people are also friends of mine, and for this reason I have spent more time in Rome than I had intended. But now I can betake myself to my country retreat and compose something, though not for a public recital, lest those whose readings I attended should think I went not so much to hear their works as to get a claim on them to come and hear mine. As in everything else, if you lend a man your ears, all the grace of the act vanishes if you ask for his in return. Farewell.

¹ The public recitations were one of the features of literary life in Rome under the empire.

TO SEPTICIUS CLARUS

(I., 15.)

WHAT a fellow you are! You promise to come to dinner and then fail to turn up! Well, here is my magisterial sentence upon you. You must pay the money I am out of pocket to the last farthing, and you will find the sum no small one. I had provided for each guest one lettuce, three snails, two eggs, spelt mixed with honey and snow (you will please reckon up the cost of the latter as among the most costly of all, since it melts away in the dish), olives from Baetica, cucumbers, onions, and a thousand other equally expensive dainties. You would have listened to a comedian, or a reciter, or a harp-player, or perhaps to all, as I am such a lavish host. But you preferred to dine elsewhere — where I know not — off oysters, sows' matrices, sea-urchins, and to watch Spanish dancing girls! You will be paid out for it, though how I decline to say. You have done violence to yourself. You have grudged, possibly yourself, but certainly me, a fine treat. Yes, yourself! For how we should have enjoyed ourselves, how we should have laughed together, how we should have applied ourselves! You can dine at many houses in better style than at mine, but nowhere will you have a better time, or such a simple free and easy entertainment. In short, give me a trial, and if afterwards you do not prefer to excuse yourself to others rather than to me, why then I give you leave to decline my invitations always. Farewell.

TO CALPURNIA ¹

(VI., 4.)

NEVER before have I chafed so much at being so busy that I could not accompany you when you set out for Campania to recruit your health, nor yet fol-

¹ His wife.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

is sure of eternal remembrance like the peoples and cities that fell with him in that memorable calamity, though, too, he had written a large number of works of lasting value, yet the undying fame of which your writings are assured will secure for his a still further lease of life. For my part, I think that those people are highly favored by Providence who are capable either of performing deeds worthy of the historian's pen or of writing histories worthy of being read, but that they are peculiarly favored who can do both. Among the latter I may class my uncle, thanks to his own writings and to yours. So I am all the more ready to fulfill your injunctions, nay, I am even prepared to beg to be allowed to undertake them.

My uncle was stationed at Misenum, where he was in active command of the fleet, with full powers. On the 23d of August, about the seventh hour, my mother drew his attention to the fact that a cloud of unusual size and shape had made its appearance. He had taken his sun bath, followed by a cold one, and after a light meal he was lying down and reading. Yet he called for his sandals, and climbed up to a spot from which he could command a good view of the curious phenomenon. Those who were looking at the cloud from some distance could not make out from which mountain it was rising, — it was afterward discovered to have been Mount Vesuvius, — but in likeness and form it more resembled a pine-tree than anything else, for what corresponded to the trunk was of great length and height, and then spread out into a number of branches, the reason being, I imagine, that while the vapor was fresh, the cloud was borne upwards, but when the vapor became wasted, it lost its motion, or even became dissipated by its own weight and spread out laterally. At times it looked white, and at other times dirty and spotted, according to the quantity of earth and cinders that were shot up.

To a man of my uncle's learning, the phenomenon appeared one of great importance, which deserved a close study. He ordered a Liburnian galley to be got ready, and offered to take me with him, if I desired to accompany him, but I replied that I preferred to go on with my studies, and it so happened that he assigned me some writing to do. He was just leaving the house when he received a written message from Rectina, the wife of Tascus, who was terrified at the peril threatening her, — for her villa lay just beneath the mountain, and there were no means of escape save by shipboard, — begging him to save her from her perilous position. So he changed his plan and carried out with the greatest fortitude the ideas which had occurred to him as a student.

He had the galleys launched and went on board himself, in the hope of succoring, not only Rectina, but many others, for there were a number of people living along the shore, owing to its delightful situation. He hastened, therefore, towards the place whence others were flying, and steering a direct course, kept the helm straight for the point of danger, so utterly devoid of fear that every movement of the looming portent and every change in its appearance he described and had noted down by his secretary, as soon as his eyes detected it. Already ashes were beginning to fall upon the ships, hotter and in thicker showers as they approached more nearly, with pumicestones and black flints, charred and cracked by the heat of the flames, while their way was barred by the sudden shoaling of the sea bottom and the litter of the mountain on the shore. He hesitated for a moment whether to turn back, and then, when the helmsman warned him to do so, he exclaimed, "Fortune favors the bold; try to reach Pomponianus." The latter was at Stabiae, separated by the whole width of the bay, for the sea there pours in upon a gently rounded and curving shore. Although the danger was not yet close upon him, it was none the less clearly seen, and it traveled quickly as it came nearer, so Pomponianus had got his baggage together on shipboard, and had determined upon flight, and was waiting for the wind which was blowing on shore to fall. My uncle sailed in with the wind fair behind him, and embraced Pomponianus, who was in a state of fright, comforting and cheering him at the same time. Then in order to calm his friend's fears by showing how composed he was himself, he ordered the servants to carry him to his bath, and, after his ablutions, he sat down and had dinner in the best of spirits, or with that assumption of good spirits which is quite as remarkable as the reality.

In the meantime broad sheets of flame, which rose high in the air, were breaking out in a number of places on Mount Vesuvius and lighting up the sky, and the glare and brightness seemed all the more striking owing to the darkness of the night. My uncle, in order to allay the fear of his companions, kept declaring that the country people in their terror had left their fires burning, and that the conflagration they saw arose from the blazing and empty villas. Then he betook himself to rest and enjoyed a very deep sleep, for his breathing, which, owing to his bulk, was rather heavy and loud, was heard by those who

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

on two slaves, he rose to his feet and immediately fell down again, owing, as I think, to his breathing being obstructed by the thickness of the fumes and congestion of the stomach, that organ being naturally weak and narrow, and subject to inflammation. When daylight returned — which was three days after his death — his body was found untouched, uninjured, and covered, dressed just as he had been in life. The corpse suggested a person asleep rather than a dead man.

Meanwhile my mother and I were at Misenum. But that is of no consequence for the purposes of history, nor indeed did you express a wish to be told anything except of my uncle's death. So I will say no more, except to add that I have given you a full account both of the incidents which I myself witnessed and of those narrated to me immediately afterwards, when, as a rule, one gets the truest account of what has happened. You will pick out what you think will answer your purpose best, for to write a letter is a different thing from writing a history, and to write to a friend is not like writing to all and sundry. Farewell.

TO SURA

(VII., 27.)

THE leisure we are both of us enjoying gives you an opportunity of imparting, and me an opportunity of receiving, information. So I should very much like to know whether in your opinion there are such things as ghosts, whether you think they have a shape of their own and a touch of the supernatural in them, or whether you consider they are vain, empty shadows and mere creatures of the imaginations. For my own part, I feel led to believe that they have a real existence, and this mainly from what befell Curtius Rufus.

In the days when he was still poor and obscure, he had attached himself to the person of the governor of Africa. One evening at sundown he was walking in the portico, when the figure of a woman — but taller and more beautiful than mortal woman — presented itself before him and told Rufus, who was terrified with fright, that she was Africa and could foretell the future. She declared that he would go to Rome and hold high offices of state, and that he would also return with plenary powers as governor to that same province, and there meet his death. All these details were fulfilled. Moreover, when he was entering Carthage and just stepping out of his ship, the same figure is said to have met him on the beach. Certain it is that when he was attacked by illness, he interpreted the future by the past, and his coming adversity by his present prosperity, and, though none of his people were despairing of his recovery, he cast aside all hope of getting better.

Now I want you to consider whether the following story, which I shall tell you just as I heard it, is not even more terrifying and no less wonderful than the other. There stood at Athens a spacious and roomy house, but it had an evil reputation of being fatal to those who lived in it. In the silence of the night the clank of iron and, if you listened with closer attention, the rattle of chains were heard, the sound coming first from a distance and afterwards quite close at hand. Then appeared the ghostly form of an old man, emaciated, filthy, decrepit, with a flowing beard and hair on end, with fetters round his legs and chains on his hands, which he kept shaking. The terrified inmates passed sleepless nights of fearful terror, and following upon their sleeplessness came disease and then death, as their fears increased. For every now and again, though the ghost had vanished, memory conjured up the vision before their eyes, and their fright remained longer than the apparition which had caused it. Then the house was deserted and condemned to stand empty, and was wholly abandoned to the spectre, while the authorities forbade that it should be sold or let to any one wishing to take it, not knowing under what a curse it lay.

The philosopher Athenodorus came to Athens, read the notice board, and on hearing the price, hesitated, because the low rent made him suspicious. Then he was told the whole story, and, so far from being deterred, he became the more eager to rent it. When evening began to fall, he ordered his people to make him up a bed in the front part of the house, and asked for his tablets, a pen, and a lamp. Dismissing all his servants to the inner rooms, he applied mind, eyes, and hand to the task of writing, lest by having nothing to think about he might begin to conjure up the apparition of which he had been told and other idle fears. At first the night was just as still there as elsewhere, then the iron was rattled and the chains clanked. Athenodorus did not raise his eyes, nor cease to write, but fortified his resolution and closed his ears. The noise became louder and drew nearer, and was heard now on the threshold and then within the room itself. He turned his head, and saw and recognized the ghost which had been described to him. It stood and beckoned with its finger, as if calling him; but Athenodorus merely motioned with his hand, as

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY
BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

any note followed, unless it was that I escaped prosecution, as I should not have done if Domitian, in whose reign these incidents had taken place, had lived any longer than he did. For in his writing-desk there was discovered a document sent in by Carus which denounced me. This gives rise to the conjecture that, as it is the custom for accused persons to let their hair go untrimmed, the fact that the hair of my slaves was cut was a sign that the peril overhanging me had passed away.

I beg of you to bring your erudition to bear on these stories. The matter is one which is worth long and careful consideration, nor am I altogether undeserving of your imparting to me your plentiful knowledge. I will let you follow your usual habit of arguing on both sides of the case, but be sure that you take up one side more strongly than the other, so that I may not go away in suspense and uncertainty, when the reason I asked your advice was just this — that you put an end to my doubts. Farewell.

TO GEMINUS

(IX., 11.)

I RECEIVED your letter, which afforded me great pleasure, especially as you say that you wish me to write you something to be inserted in your books. I shall find a subject, either the one you suggest or some other, for there are certain objections to yours, as you will see if you look around you. I did not think that there were any booksellers at Lugdunum,¹ and I am delighted to hear from you that my books are being sold there, for it is gratifying to find that they retain in foreign parts the popularity they have won at Rome. I begin to think that they must be fairly good when there is such unanimity about their merits in lands so far apart and in the judgment of persons so dissimilar. Farewell.

¹ Lyons.

TO MAXIMUS

(IX., 23.)

WHEN I have been pleading, it has often happened that the Centumviri,¹ after strictly preserving for a long time their judicial dignity and gravity, have suddenly leaped to their feet en masse and applauded me, as if they could not help themselves but were obliged to do so. I have often again left the Senate-house with just as much glory as I had hoped to obtain, but I never felt greater gratification than I did a little while ago at something which Cornelius Tacitus told me in conversation. He said that he was sitting by the side of a certain individual at the last Circensian games, and that, after they had had a long and learned talk on a variety of subjects, his acquaintance said to him: "Are you from Italy or the provinces?" Tacitus replied: "You know me quite well, and that from the books of mine you have read." "Then," said the man, "you are either Tacitus or Pliny." I cannot express to you how pleased I am that our names are, so to speak, the property of literature, that they are literary titles rather than the names of two men, and that both of us are familiar by our writings to persons who would otherwise know nothing of us.

¹ The court of one hundred judges.

A similar incident happened a day or two before. That excellent creature, Fadius Rufinus, was dining with me on the same couch, and next above him was a fellow-townsmen of his who had just that day come to town for the first time. Rufinus, pointing me out to this man, said, "Do you see my friend here?" Then they spoke at length about my literary work, and the stranger remarked, "Surely, he is Pliny." I don't mind confessing that I think I am well repaid for my work, and if Demosthenes was justified in being pleased when an old woman of Attica recognized him with the words, "Why, here is Demosthenes," ought not I too to be glad that my name is so widely known? As a matter of fact, I am glad and I say so, for I am not afraid of being considered boastful, when it is not my opinion about myself but that of others which I put forward, and especially when you are my confidant, — you who grudge no one his fair praise, and are constantly doing what you can to increase my fame. Farewell.

TO FUSCUS

(IX., 36.)

YOU ask me how I spend the day at my Tuscan villa in summer time. Well, I wake at my own sweet will, usually about the first hour, though it is often before, and rarely later. I keep my windows shut, for it is remarkable how, when all is still and in darkness, and I am withdrawn from distracting influences and am left to myself, and free to do what I like, my thoughts are not led by my eyes, but my eyes by my thoughts; and so my eyes, when they have

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies horseback instead of in a carriage, as it takes less time, and one gets over the ground faster. My friends come in from the neighboring towns to see me, and monopolize part of the day, and occasionally, when I am tired, I welcome their call as a pleasant relief. Sometimes I go hunting, but never without my tablets, so that though I may take no game, I still have something to bring back with me. Part of my time, too, is given to my tenants — though in their opinion not enough — and their clownish complaints give me a fresh zest for my literary work and my round of engagements in town. Farewell.

TO TRAJAN

(96.¹)

IT is my custom, Sire, to refer to you in all cases where I do not feel sure, for who can better direct my doubts or inform my ignorance? I have never been present at any legal examination of the Christians, and I do not know, therefore, what are the usual penalties passed upon them, or the limits of those penalties, or how searching an inquiry should be made. I have hesitated a great deal in considering whether any distinctions should be drawn according to the ages of the accused; whether the weak should be punished as severely as the more robust; whether if they renounce their faith they should be pardoned, or whether the man who has once been a Christian should gain nothing by recanting; whether the name itself, even though otherwise innocent of crime, should be punished, or only the crimes that gather round it.

¹ This letter is not only typical of the whole correspondence between Pliny and Trajan, but is of special importance in that it indicates the policy of the Roman authorities towards the Christians at this period. The next letter is the emperor's answer.

In the mean time, this is the plan which I have adopted in the case of those Christians who have been brought before me. I ask them whether they are Christians; if they say yes, then I repeat the question a second and a third time, warning them of the penalties it entails, and if they still persist, I order them to be taken to prison. For I do not doubt that, whatever the character of the crime may be which they confess, their pertinacity and inflexible obstinacy certainly ought to be punished. There were others who showed similar mad folly whom I reserved to be sent to Rome, as they were Roman citizens. Subsequently, as is usually the way, the very fact of my taking up this question led to a great increase of accusations, and a variety of cases were brought before me. A pamphlet was issued anonymously, containing the names of a number of people. Those who denied that they were or had been Christians and called upon the gods in the usual formula, reciting the words after me, those who offered incense and wine before your image, which I had given orders to be brought forward for this purpose, together with the statues of the deities, — all such I considered should be discharged, especially as they cursed the name of Christ, which, it is said, those who are really Christians cannot be induced to do. Others, whose names were given me by an informer, first said that they were Christians and afterwards denied it, declaring that they had been but were so no longer, some of them having recanted many years before, and more than one so long as twenty years back. They all worshiped your image and the statues of the deities, and cursed the name of Christ. But they declared that the sum of their guilt or their error only amounted to this, that on a stated day they had been accustomed to meet before daybreak and to recite a hymn among themselves to Christ, as though he were a god, and that so far from binding themselves by oath to commit any crime, their oath was to abstain from theft, robbery, adultery, and from breach of faith, and not to deny trust money placed in their keeping when called upon to deliver it. When this ceremony was concluded, it had been their custom to depart and meet again to take food, but it was of no special character and quite harmless, and they had ceased this practice after the edict in which, in accordance with your orders, I had forbidden all secret societies. I thought it the more necessary, therefore, to find out what truth there was in these statements by submitting two women, who were called deaconesses, to the torture, but I found nothing but a debased superstition carried to great lengths. So I postponed my examination, and immediately consulted you. The matter seems to me worthy of your consideration, especially as there are so many people involved in the danger. Many persons of all ages, and of both sexes alike, are being brought into peril of their lives by their accusers ; and the process will go on. For the contagion of this superstition has spread not only through the free cities, but into the villages and the rural districts, and yet it seems to me that it can be checked and set right. It is beyond doubt that the temples, which have been almost deserted, are beginning again to be thronged with worshipers, that the sacred rites which have for a long time been allowed to lapse are now being renewed, and that the food for the sacrifi-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

APULEIUS

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

APULEIUS, one of the most prominent of the African writers who contributed so largely to Latin literature in the second century A. D., was born at Madaura in Numidia about 130. He was educated at Carthage and Athens, and afterwards lived for a few years in Rome. The greater part of his life, however, was spent in Africa, where he lectured on rhetoric and philosophy in many different cities. We gain some knowledge of his private life from the Apologia, in which, shortly after his marriage with a rich widow, he successfully defended himself against his wife's relatives, who had accused him of resorting to magic in the furtherance of his suit.

Of his other works there are extant some philosophical treatises, a collection of excerpts from his lectures, and, most important of all, the Metamorphoses, in eleven books. In these he describes the adventures of one Lucius, who, transformed by a magic potion into the semblance of an ass but retaining still such wits as he had originally possessed, met with divers strange experiences. Like the Satirae of Petronius, the work belongs to the novel class, so sparsely represented in Latin literature, but while Petronius deals with the everyday life of certain sections of Italian society, Apuleius handles mysteries and magic. His style is one of singular opulence of phraseology, interwoven with reminiscences of the poets and showing many highly colored passages in which image follows image with wonderful profusion of detail. It is artificial to be sure, yet, in spite of its manifestly studied elaborateness, has a certain glamour of its own.

CUPID AND PSYCHE ¹

(Metamorphoses, IV., 28-VI., 24.)

IN a certain city lived a king and queen who had three daughters exceeding fair. But the beauty of the elder sisters, though pleasant to behold, yet passed not the measure of human praise, while such was the loveliness of the youngest that men's speech was too poor to commend it worthily and could express it not at all. Many of the citizens and of strangers, whom the fame of this excellent vision had gathered thither, confounded by that matchless beauty, could but kiss the finger-tips of their right hands at sight of her, as in adoration to the goddess Venus herself. And soon a rumor passed through the country that she whom the blue deep had borne, forbearing her divine dignity, was even then moving among men, or that by some fresh germination from the stars, not the sea now, but the earth, had put forth a new Venus, endued with the flower of virginity.

This belief, with the fame of the maiden's loveliness, went daily further into distant lands, so that many people were drawn together to behold that glorious model of the age. Men sailed no longer to Paphos, to Cnidos or Cythera, to the presence of the goddess Venus: her sacred rites were neglected, her images stood uncrowned, the cold ashes were left to disfigure her forsaken altars. It was to a maiden that men's prayers were offered, to a human countenance they looked, in propitiating so great a godhead : when the girl went forth in the morning they strewed flowers on her way, and the victims proper to that unseen goddess were presented as she passed along. This conveyance of divine worship to a mortal kindled meantime the anger of the true Venus. "Lo! now, the ancient parent of nature," she cried, "the fountain of all elements! Behold me, Venus, benign mother of the world, sharing my honors with a mortal maiden, while my name, built up in heaven, is profaned by the mean things of earth! Shall a perishable woman bear my image about with her? In vain did the shepherd of Ida prefer me! Yet shall she have little joy, whosoever she be, of her usurped and unlawful loveliness!" Thereupon she called to her that winged, bold boy, of evil ways, who wanders armed by night through men's houses, spoiling their marriages; and stirring yet more by her speech his inborn wantonness, she led him to the city, and showed him Psyche as she walked.

¹ This fairy-tale is one of the numerous episodes introduced into the Metamorphoses. It is said to have been overheard in a robbers' cave by Lucius, as it was told by an old woman to a captive girl.

"I pray thee," she said, "give thy mother a full revenge. Let this maid become the slave of an unworthy love." Then, embracing him closely, she departed to the shore and took her throne upon the crest of the wave. And lo! at her unuttered will, her ocean-servants are in waiting: the daughters of Ne-reus are there singing their song, and Portunus, and Salacia, and the tiny charioteer of the dolphin, with a host of Tritons leaping through the billows. And one blows softly through his sounding sea-shell, another spreads a silken web against the sun, a third

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

ple following. Psyche, bitterly weeping, assists not at her marriage but at her own obsequies, and while the parents hesitate to accomplish a thing so unholy the daughter cries to them: "Wherefore torment your luckless age by long weeping? This was the prize of my extraordinary beauty! When all people celebrated us with divine honors, and in one voice named the New Venus, it was then ye should have wept for me as one dead. Now at last I understand that that one name of Venus has been my ruin. Lead me and set me upon the appointed place. I am in haste to submit to that well-omened marriage, to behold that goodly spouse. Why delay the coming of him who was born for the destruction of the whole world?"

She was silent, and with firm step went on the way. And they proceeded to the appointed place on a steep mountain, and left there the maiden alone, and took their way homewards dejectedly. The wretched parents, in their close-shut house, yielded themselves to perpetual night; while to Psyche, fearful and trembling and weeping sore upon the mountain-top, comes the gentle Zephyrus. He lifts her mildly, and, with vesture afloat on either side, bears her by his own soft breathing over the windings of the hills, and sets her lightly among the flowers in the bosom of a valley below.

Psyche, in those delicate grassy places, lying sweetly on her dewy bed, rested from the agitation of her soul and arose in peace. And lo! a grove of mighty trees, with a fount of water, clear as glass, in the midst; and hard by the water, a dwelling-place, built not by human hands but by some divine cunning. One recognized, even at the entering, the delightful hostelry of a god. Golden pillars sustained the roof, arched most curiously in cedar-wood and ivory. The walls were hidden under wrought silver, — all tame and woodland creatures leaping forward to the visitor's gaze. Wonderful indeed was the craftsman, divine or half-divine, who by the subtlety of his art had breathed so wild a soul into the silver! The very pavement was distinct with pictures in goodly stones. In the glow of its precious metal the house is its own daylight, having no need of the sun. Well might it seem a place fashioned for the conversation of gods with men!

Psyche, drawn forward by the delight of it, came near, and, her courage growing, stood within the doorway. One by one, she admired the beautiful things she saw; and, most wonderful of all! no lock, no chain, nor living guardian protected that great treasure-house. But as she gazed there came a voice, — a voice, as it were, unclothed of bodily vesture. “Mistress!” it said, “all these things are thine. Lie down, and relieve thy weariness, and rise again for the bath when thou wilt. We thy servants, whose voice thou hearest, will be beforehand with our service, and a royal feast shall be ready.”

And Psyche understood that some divine care was providing, and, refreshed with sleep and the bath, sat down to the feast. Still she saw no one: only she heard words falling here and there, and had voices alone to serve her. And the feast being ended, one entered the chamber and sang to her unseen, while another struck the chords of a harp, invisible with him who played on it. Afterwards the sound of a company singing together came to her, but still so that none was present to sight, yet it appeared that a great multitude of singers was there.

.

One night the bridegroom spoke thus to his beloved, "O Psyche, most pleasant bride! Fortune is grown stern with us, and threatens thee with mortal peril. Thy sisters, troubled at the report of thy death and seeking some trace of thee, will come to the mountain's top. But if by chance their cries reach thee, answer not, neither look forth at all, lest thou bring sorrow upon me and destruction upon thyself." Then Psyche promised that she would do according to his will. But the bridegroom was fled away again with the night. And all that day she spent in tears, repeating that she was now dead indeed, shut up in that golden prison, powerless to console her sisters sorrowing after her, or to see their faces; and so went to rest weeping.

And after a while came the bridegroom again, and embracing her as she wept, complained, "Was this thy promise, my Psyche? What have I to hope from thee? Even in the arms of thy husband thou ceasest not from pain. Do now as thou wilt. Indulge thine own desire, though it seeks what will ruin thee. Yet wilt thou remember my warning, repentant too late." Then, protesting that she is like to die, she obtains from him that he suffer her to see her sisters, and present to them moreover what gifts she would of golden ornaments; but therewith he oftentimes advised her never at any time yielding to pernicious counsel, to inquire concerning his bodily form, lest she fall, through unholy curiosity, from so great a height of fortune, nor feel ever his embrace again. "I would die a hundred times," she said, cheerful at last, "rather than be deprived of thy most sweet usage." I love thee as my own soul, beyond comparison even with

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

cions gems, besides all that gold trodden under foot. If she indeed hath, as she said, a bridegroom so goodly, then no one in all the world is happier. And it may be that this husband, being of divine nature, will make her too a goddess. Nay, so in truth it is. It was even thus she bore herself. Already she looks aloft and breathes divinity, who, though but a woman, has voices for her handmaidens, and can command the winds." "Think," answered the other, "how arrogantly she dealt with us, grudging us these trifling gifts out of all that store, and when our company became a burden, causing us to be hissed and driven away from her through the air! But I am no woman if she keep her hold on this great fortune; and if the insult done us has touched thee too, take we counsel together. Meanwhile let us hold our peace, and know nought of her, alive or dead. For they are not truly happy of whose happiness other folk are unaware."

And the bridegroom, whom still she knows not, warns her thus a second time, as he talks with her by night: "Seest thou what peril besets thee? Those cunning wolves have made ready for thee their snares, of which the sum is that they persuade thee to search into the fashion of my countenance, the seeing of which, as I have told thee often, will be the seeing of it no more forever. But do thou neither listen nor make answer to aught regarding thy husband. Besides, we have sown also the seed of our race. Even now this bosom grows with a child to be born to us, a child, if thou but keep our secret, of divine quality; if thou profane it, subject to death." And Psyche was glad at the tidings, rejoicing in that solace of a divine seed, and in the glory of that pledge of love to be, and the dignity of the name of mother. Anxiously she notes the increase of the days, the waning months. And again, as he tarries briefly beside her, the bridegroom repeats his warning: "Even now the sword is drawn with which thy sisters seek thy life. Have pity on thyself, sweet wife, and upon our child, and see not those evil women again." But the sisters make their way into the palace once more, crying to her in wily tones, "O Psyche! and thou too wilt be a mother! How great will be the joy at home! Happy indeed shall we be to have the nursing of the golden child. Truly if he be answerable to the beauty of his parents, it will a birth of Cupid himself."

So, little by little, they stole upon the heart of their sister. She, meanwhile, bids the lyre to sound for their delight, and the playing is heard: she bids the pipes to move, the quire to sing, and the music and the singing come invisibly, soothing the mind of the listener with sweetest modulation. Yet not even thereby was their malice put to sleep: once more they seek to know what manner of husband she has, and whence that seed. And Psyche, simple over-much, forgetful of her first story, answers, "My husband comes from a far country, trading for great sums. He is already of middle age, with whitening locks." And therewith she dismisses them again.

And returning home upon the soft breath of Zephyrus one cried to the other, "What shall be said of so ugly a lie? He who was a young man with goodly beard is now in middle life. It must be that she told a false tale: else is she in very truth ignorant of what manner of man he is. Howsoever it be, let us destroy her quickly. For if she indeed knows not, be sure that her bridegroom is one of the gods: it is a god she bears in her womb. And let that be far from us! If she be called the mother of a god, then will life be more than I can bear."

So, full of rage against her, they returned to Psyche, and said to her craftily, "Thou livest in an ignorant bliss, all incurious of thy real danger. It is a deadly serpent, as we certainly know, that comes to sleep at thy side. Remember the words of the oracle, which declared thee destined to a cruel beast. There are those who have seen it at nightfall, coming back from its feeding. In no long time, they say, it will end its blandishments. It but waits for the babe to be formed in thee, that it may devour thee by so much the richer. If indeed the solitude of this musical place, or it may be the loathsome commerce of a hidden love, delight thee, we at least in sisterly piety have done our part." And at last the unhappy Psyche, simple and frail of soul, carried away by the terror of their words, losing memory of her husband's precepts and her own promise, brought upon herself a great calamity. Trembling and turning pale, she answers them, "And they who tell those things, it may be, speak the truth. For in very deed never have I seen the face of my husband, nor know I at all what manner of man he is. Always he frights me diligently from the sight of him, threatening some great evil should I too curiously look upon his face. Do ye, if ye can help your sister in her great peril, stand by her now."

Her sisters answered her, "The way of safety we have well considered, and will teach thee. Take a sharp knife, and hide it in that part of the couch where thou art wont to lie: take also a lamp filled with oil, and set it privily behind the curtain. And when he shall have drawn up his coils into the accus-

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

dew, are spotless upon his shoulders, the delicate plumage wavering over them as they lie at rest. Smooth he was, and touched with light, worthy of Venus his mother. At the foot of the couch lay his bow and arrows, the instruments of his power, propitious to men.

And Psyche gazing hungrily thereon, draws an arrow from the quiver, and trying the point upon the thumb, tremulous still, drove in the barb, so that a drop of blood came forth. Thus fell she, by her own act, and unaware, into the love of Love. Falling upon the bridegroom, with indrawn breath, in a hurry of kisses from eager and open lips, she shuddered as she thought how brief that sleep might be. And it chanced that a drop of burning oil fell from the lamp upon the god's shoulder. Ah! maladroit minister of love, thus to wound him from whom all fire comes; though 't was a lover, I trow, first devised thee, to have the fruit of his desire even in the darkness! At the touch of the fire the god started up, and beholding the overthrow of her faith, quietly took flight from her embraces.

And Psyche, as he rose upon the wing, laid hold on him with her two hands, hanging upon him in his passage through the air, till she sinks to the earth through weariness. And as she lay there, the divine lover, tarrying still, lighted upon a cypress tree which grew near, and, from the top of it, spake thus to her, in great emotion. "Foolish one! unmindful of the command of Venus, my mother, who had devoted thee to one of base degree, I fled to thee in his stead. Now know I that this was vainly done. Into mine own flesh pierced mine arrow, and I made thee my wife, only that I might seem a monster beside thee — that thou shouldst seek to wound the head wherein lay the eyes so full of love to thee! Again and again, I thought to put thee on thy guard concerning these things, and warned thee in lovingkindness. Now I would but punish thee by my flight hence." And therewith he winged his way into the deep sky.

Psyche, prostrate upon the earth, and following far as sight might reach the flight of the bridegroom, wept and lamented; and when the breadth of space had parted him wholly from her, cast herself down from the bank of a river which was nigh. But the stream, turning gentle in honor of the god, put her forth again unhurt upon its margin. And as it happened, Pan, the rustic god, was sitting just then by the waterside. Hard by, his flock of goats browsed at will. And the shaggy god called her, wounded and outworn, kindly to him and said, "I am but a rustic herdsman, pretty maiden, yet wise, by favor of my great age and long experience; and if I guess truly by those faltering steps, by thy sorrowful eyes and continual sighing, thou laborest with excess of love. Listen then to me, and seek not death again, in the stream or otherwise. Put aside thy woe, and turn thy prayers to Cupid. He is in truth a delicate youth: win him by the delicacy of thy service."

So the shepherd-god spoke, and Psyche, answering nothing, but with a reverence to this serviceable deity, went on her way. And while she, in her search after Cupid, wandered through many lands, he was lying in the chamber of his mother, heart-sick. And the white bird which floats over the waves plunged in haste into the sea, and approaching Venus, as she bathed, made known to her that her son lies afflicted with some grievous hurt, doubtful of life. And Venus cried, angrily, "My son, then, has a mistress! And it is Psyche, who witched away my beauty and was the rival of my godhead, whom he loves!"

Therewith she issued from the sea, and returning to her golden chamber, found there the lad, sick, as she had heard, and cried from the doorway, "Well done, truly! to trample thy mother's precepts under foot, to spare my enemy that cross of an unworthy love; nay, unite her to thyself, child as thou art, that I might have a daughter-in-law who hates me! I will make thee repent of thy sport, and the savour of thy marriage bitter. There is one who shall chasten this body of thine, put out thy torch and unstring thy bow. Not till she has plucked forth that hair, into which so oft these hands have smoothed the golden light, and sheared away thy wings, shall I feel the injury done me avenged." And with this she hastened in anger from the doors.

And Ceres and Juno met her, and sought to know the meaning of her troubled countenance. "Ye come in season," she cried; "I pray you, find for me Psyche. It must needs be that ye have heard the disgrace of my house." And they, ignorant of what was done, would have soothed her anger, saying, "What fault, Mistress, hath thy son committed, that thou wouldst destroy the girl he loves? Knowest thou not that he is now of age? Because he wears his years so lightly must he seem to thee ever but a child? Wilt thou forever thus pry into the pastimes of thy son, always accusing his wantonness, and blaming in him those delicate wiles which are all thine own?" Thus, in secret fear of the boy's bow, did they seek to please him with their gracious patronage. But Venus, angry at their light taking of her wrongs, turned her back

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY
BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

and mysterious invention of thy daughter Proserpine,¹ and by all beside that the holy place of Attica veils in silence, minister, I pray thee, to the sorrowful heart of Psyche! Suffer me to hide myself but for a few days among the heaps of corn, till time have softened the anger of the goddess, and my strength, outworn in my long travail, be recovered by a little rest."

But Ceres answered her, "Truly thy tears move me, and I would fain help thee; only I dare not incur the ill-will of my kinswoman. Depart hence as quickly as may be." And Psyche, repelled against hope, afflicted now with twofold sorrow, making her way back again, beheld among the half-lighted woods of the valley below a sanctuary builded with cunning art. And that she might lose no way of hope, howsoever doubtful, she drew near to the sacred doors. She sees there gifts of price, and garments fixed upon the door-posts and to the branches of the trees, wrought with letters of gold which told the name of the goddess to whom they were dedicated, with thanksgiving for that she had done. So, with bent knee and hands laid about the glowing altar, she prayed saying, "Sister and spouse of Jupiter! be thou to these my desperate fortunes Juno the Auspicious! I know that thou dost willingly help those in travail with child; deliver me from the peril that is upon me." And as she prayed thus, Juno in the majesty of her godhead was straightway present, and answered, "Would that I might incline favorably to thee; but against the will of Venus, whom I have ever loved as a daughter, I may not, for very shame, grant thy prayer."

And Psyche, dismayed by this new shipwreck of her hope, communed thus with herself, "Whither, from the midst of the snares that beset me, shall I take my way once more? In what dark solitude shall I hide me from the all-seeing eye of Venus? What if I put on at length a man's courage, and yielding myself unto her as my mistress, soften by a humility not yet too late the fierceness of her purpose? Who knows but that I may find him also whom my soul seeketh after, in the abode of his mother?"

¹ The reference is to the festival celebrated in the autumn at Eleusis in Attica, in honor of Demeter (Ceres) and Persephone (Proserpina).

And Venus, renouncing all earthly aid in her search, prepared to return to heaven. She ordered the chariot to be made ready, wrought for her by Vulcan as a marriage-gift, with a cunning of hand which had left his work so much the richer by the weight of gold it lost under his tool. From the multitude which housed about the bed-chamber of their mistress, white doves came forth, and with joyful motions bent their painted necks beneath the yoke. Behind it, with playful riot, the sparrows sped onward, and other birds sweet of song, making known by their soft notes the approach of the goddess. Eagle and cruel hawk alarmed not the quireful family of Venus. And the clouds broke away, as the uttermost ether opened to receive her, daughter and goddess, with great joy.

And Venus passed straightway to the house of Jupiter to beg from him the service of Mercury, the god of speech. And Jupiter refused not her prayer. And Venus and Mercury descended from heaven together; and as they went, the former said to the latter, "Thou knowest, my brother of Arcady, that never at any time have I done anything without thy help; for how long time, moreover, I have sought a certain maiden in vain. And now nought remains but that, by thy heraldry, I proclaim a reward for whomsoever shall find her. Do thou my bidding quickly." And therewith she conveyed to him a little scrip, in the which was written the name of Psyche, with other things; and so returned home.

And Mercury failed not in his office; but departing into all lands, proclaimed that whosoever delivered up to Venus the fugitive girl, should receive from herself seven kisses — one thereof full of the inmost honey of her throat. With that the doubt of Psyche was ended. And now, as she came near to the doors of Venus, one of the household, whose name was Use-and-Wont, ran out to her crying, "Hast thou learned, Wicked Maid! now at last! that thou hast a mistress?" and seizing her roughly by the hair, drew her into the presence of Venus. And when Venus saw her, she cried out, saying, "Thou hast deigned, then, to make thy salutations to thy mother-in-law. Now will I in turn treat thee as becometh a dutiful daughter-in-law."

And she took barley and millet and poppy-seed, every kind of grain and seed, and mixed them together, and laughed, and said to her: "Methinks so plain a maiden can earn lovers only by industrious ministry: now will I also make trial of thy service. Sort me this heap of seed, the one kind from the others, grain by grain; and get thy task done before the evening." And Psyche, stunned by the cruelty of her bidding, was silent, and moved not her hand to the inextricable heap. And there came forth a little ant, which had understanding of the difficulty of her task, and took pity upon the consort of the god of Love; and he ran deftly hither and thither, and called together the whole army of his fellows. "Have pity," he cried, "nimble scholars of the Earth, Mother of

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Get Smart

Over 2,000 years of
human knowledge in
797,885 volumes

Instant access
$8.99/month

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

waters the Stygian fields, and swells the flood of Cocytus. Bring me now, in this little urn, a draught from its innermost source." And therewith she put into her hands a vessel of wrought crystal.

And Psyche set forth in haste on her way to the mountain, looking there at last to find the end of her hapless life. But when she came to the region which borders on the cliff that was showed to her, she understood the deadly nature of her task. From a great rock, steep and slippery, a horrible river of water poured forth, falling straightway by a channel exceeding narrow into the unseen gulf below. And lo! creeping from the rocks on either hand, angry serpents, with their long necks and sleepless eyes. The very waters found a voice and bade her depart, in smothered cries of, Depart hence! and, What doest thou here? Look around thee! and Destruction is upon thee! And then sense left her, in the immensity of her peril, as one changed to stone.

Yet not even then did the distress of this innocent soul escape the steady eye of a gentle providence. For the bird of Jupiter spread his wings and took flight to her, and asked her, "Didst thou think, simple one, even thou! that thou couldst steal one drop of that relentless stream, the holy river of Styx, terrible even to the gods? But give me thine urn." And the bird took the urn, and filled it at the source, and returned to her quickly from among the teeth of the serpents, bringing with him of the waters, all unwilling — nay! warning him to depart away and not molest them.

And she, receiving the urn with great joy, ran back quickly that she might deliver it to Venus, and yet again satisfied not the angry goddess. "My child!"

she said, "in this one thing further must thou serve me. Take now this tiny casket, and get thee down even unto hell, and deliver it to Proserpine. Tell her that Venus would have of her beauty so much at least as may suffice for but one day's use, that beauty she possessed erewhile being forworn and spoiled, through her tendance upon the sick-bed of her son; and be not slow in returning."

And Psyche perceived there the last ebbing of her fortune — that she was now thrust openly upon death, who must go down, of her own motion, to Hades and the Shades. And straightway she climbed to the top of an exceeding high tower, thinking within herself, "I will cast myself down thence: so shall I descend most quickly into the kingdom of the dead." And the tower again broke forth into speech: "Wretched Maid! Wretched Maid! Wilt thou destroy thyself? If the breath quit thy body, then wilt thou indeed go down into Hades, but by no means return hither. Listen to me. Among the pathless wilds not far from this place lies a certain mountain, and therein one of hell's vent-holes. Through the breach a rough way lies open, following which thou wilt come, by straight course, to the castle of Orcus. And thou must not go empty-handed. Take in each hand a morsel of barley-bread, soaked in hydromel; and in thy mouth two pieces of money. And when thou shalt be now well onward in the way of death, then wilt thou overtake a lame ass laden with wood, and a lame driver, who will pray thee reach him certain cords to fasten the burden which is falling from the ass; but be thou cautious to pass on in silence. And soon as thou comest to the river of the dead, Charon, in that crazy bark he hath, will put thee over upon the further side.

There is greed even among the dead ; and thou shalt deliver to him, for the ferrying, one of those two pieces of money, in such wise that he take it with his hand from between thy lips. And as thou passest over the stream, a dead old man, rising on the water, will put up to thee his mouldering hands, and pray thee draw him into the ferry-boat. But beware thou yield not to unlawful pity.

“ When thou shalt be come over, and art upon the causeway, certain aged women, spinning, will cry to thee to lend thy hand to their work ; and beware again that thou take no part therein ; for this also is the snare of Venus, whereby she would cause thee to cast away one at least of those cakes thou bearest in thy hands. And think not that a slight matter ; for the loss of either one of them will be to thee the losing of the light of day. For a watch-dog exceeding fierce lies ever before the threshold of that lonely house of Proserpine. Close his mouth with one of thy cakes ; so shalt thou pass by him, and enter straightway into the presence of Proserpine herself. Then do thou deliver thy message, and taking what she shall give thee, return back again ; offering to the watch-dog the other cake, and to the ferryman that other piece of money thou hast in thy mouth. After this manner mayst thou return again beneath the stars. But withal, I charge thee, think not to look into, nor open, the caskest thou bearest, with that treasure of the beauty of the divine countenance hidden therein.”

So spake the stones of the tower ; and Psyche delayed not, but proceeding diligently after the manner enjoined, entered into the house of Proserpine, at whose feet she sat down humbly, and would neither the delicate couch nor that divine food the goddess

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership
provides unlimited
access to more than
28,000 volumes of
Christian literature for
$8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

due honor. Often hast thou vexed my bosom, wherein lies the disposition of the stars, with those busy darts of thine. Nevertheless, because thou hast grown up between these mine hands, I will accomplish thy desire." And straightway he bade Mercury call the gods together; and, the council-chamber being filled, sitting upon a high throne, "Ye gods," he said, "all ye whose names are in the white book of the Muses, ye know yonder lad. It seems good to me that his youthful heats should by some means be restrained. And that all occasion may be taken from him, I would even confine him in the bonds of marriage. He has chosen and embraced a mortal maiden. Let him have fruit of his love, and possess her forever."

Thereupon he bade Mercury produce Psyche in heaven; and holding out to her his ambrosial cup, "Take it," he said, "and live forever; nor shall Cupid ever depart from thee." And the gods sat down together to the marriage-feast. On the first couch lay the bridegroom, and Psyche in his bosom. His rustic serving-boy bare the wine to Jupiter; and Bacchus to the rest. The Seasons crimsoned all things with their roses. Apollo sang to the lyre, while a little Pan prattled on his reeds, and Venus danced very sweetly to the soft music. Thus — with due rites — did Psyche pass into the power of Cupid; and from them was born the daughter whom men call Voluptas.

WALTER PATER, in Marius the Epicurean.